Pension funds sink billions into a new world of risk

Bloomberg

For decades, pension funds can't afford to be the place most people would order delivery to, yet suddenly and seemingly overnight, billions of dollars are pouring into them. The reason: central banks around the world are roiling markets with record-low interest rates, driving interest-sensitive liabilities to sky-high levels.

For the average Canadian pension fund, the problem is this: their asset managers are invested in the stock market, in areas where yields are low. The result, according to Thijs Knaap, a leader in the asset management space at PGIM Fixed Income, is that pension funds are being forced to look elsewhere for returns.

"We've been stuck in the equity market for the last 30 years," Knaap said. "But now we're starting to see a change. We're starting to see a lot more interest in alternative investments."

Knaap is not alone. In recent weeks, a wave of pension funds have been pouring billions of dollars into alternative investments, from real estate to infrastructure to private credit and even cryptocurrencies. The total amount is estimated to be in the billions, with some estimates putting the figure at over $1 trillion.

"It's all about timing the cycle," said Knaap. "We're seeing a lot of money coming into the market, and we're seeing a lot of money flowing out."

But the question is, what's driving this trend? And what does it mean for the future of pension funds?

"There are a few factors at play," said Knaap. "First, interest rates are very low. This makes it difficult for pension funds to generate returns from traditional investments. Second, the global environment is becoming more uncertain, which makes it difficult for traditional investments to perform well. Third, there's a trend towards de-risking, which means that pension funds are moving away from traditional investments and into alternative investments, which offer higher returns."

Knaap added that the trend is likely to continue, as pension funds seek to protect their retirement assets from the volatility of traditional investments.

"We're seeing a lot of money flowing into alternative investments," Knaap said. "And we're seeing a lot of money flowing out of traditional investments."

But what does this mean for the future of pension funds? Knaap said that it's too early to tell, but that pension funds will need to be more diversified in the future to account for this trend.

Danger grows as China’s hottest stocks get increasingly crowded

People stand in front of a sculpture of bulls at the entrance to the Shanghai Stock Exchange building in China. Only a few terms of the CSI 300 Index have outperformed the gauge this year, the smallest proportion in any year since 2005, according to Bloomberg.

People invested in developing China’s fifth-generation of cellular network technology are among investors. With China’s Alcatel-Lucent unit of the France-based carrier equipment maker and Huawei Technologies Co. of China as consumer and stocks traded as a proxy for state-owned enterprises, investors bet on companies that can generate stable earnings growth despite a slowing economy and trade uncertainties.

A majority of consumer stocks have rallied 77% this year, the most among global sectors, as they were hurt by the trade war. In contrast, a measure of energy stocks -- the worst-performing sector -- lost less than 4%.

Tokyo stock market tumbled yesterday as worse-than-expected US data revived worries about the impact of the US-China trade war on the global economy.

London was additionally hit by a 1% decline from Johnson even as the pound stopped falling from its earlier lows. However, it is not clear how much of the impact will be felt at a short-term level as it is likely to be stashed away from the future.

The data also showed the job market has slowed, despite hopes for the US Federal Reserve’s interest rate cuts, while the corporate earnings season is also due to get underway.

The figures came ahead of the all-important government-employee report due tomorrow, which is likely to set the tone for more US Federal Reserve rate cuts in the future. The pound was closed for a holiday.
