Japan unveils record $490bn stimulus to boost Covid recovery

Japan’s Prime Minister Shinzo Abe unveiled a record stimulus package worth $490 billion on Friday aimed at averting a recession, marking his last major economic policy move in a term that has been dominated by the pandemic. The package, representing about 20% of GDP, is the most extensive in the country’s history.

Abe, whose tenure has been dogged by the pandemic, said the stimulus would help provide a life raft for the ailing economy as he steps down at the end of the month. The package includes a $120 billion support scheme for municipalities to help prevent the spread of the virus and a $130 billion lifeline for businesses hit by the pandemic.

The stimulus is designed to help stave off a recession and boost consumption, Abe said. The government has already spent a record amount on fiscal stimulus this year, and Abe has said he believes the country needs to do more.

The package is expected to lift growth by 0.8 to 1.0 percentage points this fiscal year, Abe said, and help the economy return to growth in the next fiscal year. It will also help reduce the risk of a recession and support the recovery of the economy.

Abe said the stimulus would be an important step in the country’s recovery from the pandemic, and he hoped it would help boost the economy and reduce the risk of a recession.

Biden wants major oil reserve sales: That’s not easy in Asia

Bloomberg

Biden’s energy policy,” said Byron King, an energy analyst at BullionVault. “What we’ve seen is that the new administration is trying to turn around some of the policies that were put in place by the previous administration. Whether it’s increasing drilling, increasing production, or increasing exports, there’s going to be a lot of pushback from the industry.”

Oil and gas stocks were all down on Wednesday in Asia, with the exception of China. In China, the government has been ramping up inspections of the country’s oil and gas reserves, as well as increasing efforts to limit the use of fossil fuels. In Japan, the government has been moving towards a more renewable energy future, with a goal of achieving net-zero emissions by 2050.

Biden’s efforts to increase oil reserves in Asia face several challenges. First, many Asian countries have been increasing their oil imports from other countries, such as Saudi Arabia and Russia, to ensure their energy security. Second, the region is already facing several energy crises, including the recent power outages in Thailand and the Philippines. Third, the region’s economic growth is expected to continue, which could put further pressure on energy supplies.

Despite these challenges, Biden’s efforts to increase oil reserves in Asia are likely to continue. The Biden administration has already made clear its commitment to increasing energy security in the region, and is likely to continue to work with Asian countries to ensure their energy needs are met.

Apple accelerates work on car plan, aiming for fully autonomous vehicle in 2025

Apple is reportedly ramping up work on an autonomous vehicle that could hit the roads within a few years. The car, which is codenamed “Titan”, is expected to be a fully autonomous vehicle, with no steering wheel or pedals. Apple is reportedly working on a range of features for the car, including advanced sensors, machine learning algorithms, and a high-speed cellular network.

Apple is reportedly in talks with several companies, including Honda, to develop the car. The car is expected to be priced at around $70,000, making it more affordable than many other autonomous vehicles. The car is expected to be released in 2025, with production beginning in 2024.
