N Korea 'conducts test of rocket launchers'

Background

North Korean state news agency KCNA on Wednesday reported that North Korea had conducted another test of the "super-large multiple rocket launchers" following two tests of the same weapon in August and September. The tests were in response to US sanctions, which prompted North Korea to renew its efforts to develop new weapons. North Korea's rocket tests have been a source of concern for the international community, as they are seen as a provocation and a test of the country's military capabilities.

Quote

"The tests were the first since one day of talks between the United States and North Korea ended without an agreement on October 5. The talks were intended to mark the start of a denuclearisation talk towards a peaceful resolution of the Korean Peninsula." - KCNA

The suspension of priority investigations is ‘one of the most serious matters that Gloriati came across in his inquiry’.

Gloriati also called for a review of the system for prioritizing investigations. His report said the system had not been properly reviewed in more than 15 years. He recommended that the system be updated to reflect the changing priorities of the police and the public.

Gloriati’s report also highlighted the importance of transparent decision-making in the prioritization of investigations. He recommended that the police publish information on how investigations are prioritized and the criteria used to allocate resources to different cases.

In conclusion, Gloriati’s report underscores the critical role of prioritization in the work of the police. It highlights the need for a system that is transparent, accountable, and responsive to the changing priorities of the public and the police. The report serves as a call to action for the police to review and update their systems for prioritizing investigations in order to improve their effectiveness and efficiency.

Inmates fighting Calif. fires deserve a chance at full-time jobs

As California continues to burn, the state's firefighters have already responded with heroic efforts to control the fast-burning wind, hitting toward the flames, cutting fire lines and protecting lives and property. Still, there's a major roadblock that saves lives and prevents more devastation. And sometimes, it's done by prison inmates.

Among the thousands of federal, state and local firefighting agencies, only four states have more than 2,600 prison inmates who volunteer and train to serve on the crew, while California is one of them. As a result, the training and expertise the inmates gain while incarcerated can't help them land a job in their hometown fire department.

This is absurd. California's prison system doesn't have an authority that supervises their training and rehabilitation programmes for inmates. The prison fire crews are paid 90% of what their pay - between $2 and $5 a day, plus $1 per hour when on the fire lines, according to the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation. The inmate crews receive the same training as their seasonal firefighting assignments.

Inmates working as firefighters do much of the same work, though their pay isn't nearly as much. They can't be aware of the new requirements and restrictions for their clients to consider rescheduling their visas and interviews until there is more clarity. The proclamation does not accept long-term plans on the state guidelines in the proclamation, which advocates said.

Trump rule on health insurance hits immigrants, companies

By Kristie Cooke and Nicole Silverstein

Nov 15. By one decade after receiving US citizenship, Caesarlina Lopez had saved enough and planned to buy her parents a trip to join her in the US. But then President Donald Trump overruled her plans to join him in the US.

Then on Oct 4 45th President reshuffled the order of the visas and others were changed with Trump's new proclamation. The guidance for the federal government is now that all US health insurance within 10 months of the interview, or even enough for "reasonably foreseeably medical expenses." The new regulation, part of the Trump administration's overall push to make immigration less easy for illegal immigrants, aims to ensure that families who have been living in the US could not get coverage.

Still, there are tangible benefits for the inmates. The work gets them out from behind the bars qualifies them for the least restrictive supervision for inmates who work in life-and-death situations. It's foolish to allow blanket restrictions on professional licensing to prevent them using those skills after they are released.

Automating segregation

By Nicholas Agar

Tech critics and futurists have long warned that technology will displace millions of workers by automating all but the most extreme jobs. But what about the jobs that do remain? In the future, does automation mean work will simply be harder and more dangerous? The authors argue that automation is more likely to change the way people work, not the kind of work they do. They argue that automation will change the nature of work, making it more different from what we know today. The authors argue that automation will have a profound effect on the economy, and that we need to prepare for a new future of work. They argue that we need to think about the future of work in a new way, and that we need to prepare for a future of work that is different from what we know today. Glittering opening to Asjad Jewellery Exhibition

By Asjad Ady Staff Reporter

T he 6th World Congress of the World Federation of Associations of Paediatric Surgeons (WOF APS) started yesterday at the Qatar National Convention Centre with the attendance of over 800 surgeons from more than 80 countries. The three-day congress, hosted by Asjad Medicine, and being held for the first time in the Middle East, will conclude on October 17.

The conference aims to improve the surgical care of children in the Middle East region, through training, collaboration, education, and research. It is designed to help raise awareness of the importance of early diagnosis and treatment of children’s conditions.

"Qatar is the first Middle East country to host such a major paediatric surgery congress. As a Qatar surgeon, I am proud to see the readiness and capability of the local healthcare organisation like Sidra Medicine to host such a global event," said Dr. Massow NA, executive director of the World Federation of Associations of Paediatric Surgeons.

Dr. Massow said the congress has been an opportunity to share the latest advancements in surgical care and to connect with colleagues from around the world.

"We are now at the forefront of surgical access to everyone. That is one of the reasons why we decided to have the congress in Qatar," he said.

The congress is being held in collaboration with the Qatar Academy for Science and Technology (QAST), and will cover a wide range of topics including the latest surgical techniques, innovative treatments, and research in the field of paediatric surgery.

The congress is also an opportunity for the Qatari medical community to showcase their excellence in the field, and to work towards improving the quality of care for children in the region.

"Qatar has the potential to be a global leader in surgical care for children. We are excited to host this important event and look forward to continued collaboration with our colleagues around the world," said Dr. Massow.

The congress will conclude on October 17, with a closing ceremony that will feature keynote speakers and presentations from around the world.

"This event is a testament to Qatar’s commitment to excellence in surgical care, and we are proud to host such a high-level event," said Dr. Massow, "We are looking forward to working with our colleagues from around the world to improve the quality of care for children in Qatar and the wider region."
