Two Palestinian teens killed in Israeli arson

President Donald Trump appeared prepared to ignore the US Congress's growing interest in its own informal sanctions in a national security decision that could result in the closure of the American consulate in Jerusalem.

Khalid Khogali

and most

all middle-eastern nations, including Saudian Arabia, Egypt, and Jordan, have publicly appealed for a change in US politics and for a return to the path of diplomacy.

The US president had earlier said that it was time to "start doing something about the situation in the Middle East." He had also called for an end to "the brutal and cruel" treatment of Palestinians by Israeli authorities.

But on Thursday, during a press conference at the White House, Trump said

he was open to"the idea of doing something different" in the region.

"I think that the US, with the help of the International Criminal Court, should be taking action on Israel," he said.

"And I think that's a great thing to do."

Trump added that he had been given the option of "a number of different things"
that could be done to address the situation in the region.

"I'm not interested in getting into a battle of words," he said.

"I'm interested in finding a solution," he added.

"That's what we're here for. That's what we're here for."

Trump's comments come after a series of US military strikes against

Iran-backed targets in Syria that were designed to punish the Islamic State group for its role in the August 2017 attack on a US base in Iraq.

"We are doing very well," Trump said.

"We have a very good chance of winning,"
he added.

"And we'll see what happens in the future," he said.

added.

Military commander warns of ISIS resurgence in nation

By Corazon Foxxx

A military commander in the Philippines has warned that the country’s fight against ISIS will continue even after the group’s defeat last year.

“The war is not over,” said Lt. Gen. Rolando B. Dela Vega, overall commander of the Western Mindanao Command (Western MindCom), in an interview with ABS-CBN’s Teleradyo, which aired Friday.

Dela Vega said the group’s resurgence is expected once its fighters are fully disconnected from their local support network or suspect safe haven.

He also said that ISIS is still an active terrorist group and a threat to the country.

The comments came just over a year after IS was defeated in Marawi City, after a five-month battle between government forces and the extremist group.

The Philippines is also home to other terrorist groups, including Abu Sayyaf, Jemaah Islamiyah, and the Moro National Liberation Front (MNLF).

The government has been working to address the threat of ISIS and other terrorist groups in the country, as well as to improve its governance and infrastructure.

Dela Vega’s warning comes as the Philippines is preparing for the 2019 national elections, which are expected to be a testing ground for the country’s democracy.

The election is also a significant milestone for the country, as it marks the end of the Marcos dictatorship and the beginning of a new era of democratic governance.

The election will be watched closely by international and domestic observers, who will be looking for signs of political stability and economic growth.

Dela Vega’s comments come amid growing concerns about the rise of ISIS and other extremist groups in the region, as well as the potential for ongoing conflict in the Philippines.

The government has been working to strengthen its counterterrorism capabilities and to improve its diplomatic relations with other countries in the region.

Overall, the situation in the Philippines remains complex, with a mixture of political, economic, and security challenges.

But despite the challenges, there is hope for a better future, as the country works to build a brighter and more prosperous nation for all its citizens.
