The killing of civilians continued in Afghanistan as the Taliban launched a major offensive in the country, with reports of at least 120 deaths in the past week alone.

The United Nations has called for an immediate end to all hostilities in Yemen, warning that the situation was rapidly deteriorating.

Libyan rebels on Sunday launched a major offensive against the government of the former leader Moammar Gadhafi, causing heavy casualties and forcing government troops to retreat.

At least 40 people were killed and 150 injured in a deadly attack on a UN peacekeeping base in the capital, Tripoli.

The United Nations has called for an immediate ceasefire in Yemen, and for all parties to the conflict to respect international law.

The body of the Russian pilot captured by the Islamic State group near Syria has been recovered.

Climate change

The UN has released a new report on global warming, warning that the world is on track for a catastrophic temperature rise of 3.5 degrees Celsius by the end of the century.

The report calls for urgent action to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, and for increased investment in clean energy technologies.

The report also highlights the need for international cooperation to address the global climate crisis.

The Paris Agreement was signed in 2015, but has not yet been implemented by all countries.

The United Nations is calling for a Climate Summit in September, with the aim of strengthening global efforts to combat climate change.

The summit will bring together leaders from around the world to discuss the latest climate science and to make concrete commitments to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

The summit will also provide an opportunity for governments to show their commitment to the Paris Agreement and to work together to find solutions to the climate crisis.

The summit is expected to be a key moment in the global effort to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, and to avoid a catastrophic temperature rise of 3.5 degrees Celsius by the end of the century.

The report by the National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls, released in Ottawa on Monday, is the culmination of a nearly two-decade investigation into the deaths and disappearances of hundreds of indigenous women and girls.

The inquiry, which was launched in 2013, concluded that the deaths and disappearances of indigenous women and girls were a result of a systemic failure by the Canadian government and society to address the issue.

The report called for a series of recommendations, including the establishment of a national database of missing and murdered indigenous women and girls, the creation of a national strategy to address the issue, and the implementation of culturally appropriate services to support survivors.

China urges students to weigh ‘risk of studying in US’

China has warned students and academics to consider the “risk of studying in the United States after an uptick in visa delays and arrest of trade war and other tensions with Washington.

The warning came as reports emerged that Chinese students and academics have faced delays in visa applications, and that they have been asked to justify their studies in the United States.

“[The] Chinese embassy in the United States has received numerous inquiries from Chinese citizens in the United States who are planning to study or work in the United States,” the embassy said in a statement.

It noted that China’s State Department had asked the Chinese citizens to submit their visa applications in advance, and that the US embassy would evaluate each case on a case-by-case basis.

China’s warning comes after reports emerged that Chinese students and researchers have faced difficulties in obtaining visa approvals to study or work in the United States.

China’s State Department has said that it would conduct a “risk assessment” of all Chinese citizens who wish to study or work in the United States.

The embassy said that it would review each case on its merits, and that it would not make decisions based on the political affiliations of the students.

The embassy added that it would continue to monitor the situation and provide updated information to Chinese citizens.

“Solomon Islands government and the Australian government have committed to work together to address the region’s challenges and to promote stability and prosperity in the Pacific region,” Prime Minister Scott Morrison said.

The pledge was made in a statement issued on the sidelines of the Leaders’ Retreat at the Shangri-La Dialogue, a security conference attended by leaders from the Asia-Pacific region.

Morrison said that the funds would be used to support development projects in the Solomons.

The Solomons is one of the world’s poorest countries, with a per capita GDP of just $1000.

“By partnering with the Solomon Islands, we are supporting the government’s efforts to drive economic growth and improve the lives of its citizens,” Morrison said.

The pledge comes as China has become a major investor in the region, with a growing number of Chinese companies and investors working in the Solomons.

Jailed Australian cardinal appeals to Supreme Court against child abuse convictions

Cardinal George Pell has appealed to the Australian Supreme Court against his conviction for child abuse.

Pell was convicted in March of sexually abusing choirboys while he was a priest in Melbourne in the 1990s.

The appeal seeks to overturn the conviction, which was based on evidence from the boys and from other witnesses.

The cardinal has maintained his innocence and has refused to testify at the trial.

The appeal was filed with the Supreme Court on Monday, and will be heard in the coming months.

The case has sparked a nationwide debate about the handling of child abuse cases in the Catholic Church.

Germany’s SPD seeks new leader, questions coalition

Outgoing Social Democratic Party (SPD) leader Andrea Nahles addresses the media in front of the SPD party’s headquarters in Berlin yesterday.

"A coalition without a clear strategy," said SPD Social-Democratic Party leader Andrea Nahles as she said she would quit the chancellorship in the wake of her leadership resignation announcement yesterday.

"The Social-Democratic Party is the only party that can lead Germany," Nahles said, adding that she had decided to resign as leader of the SPD because she believed it was the right moment for a change.

"I have taken this decision not because I have lost my confidence in the party or its future, but because I believe that now is the time for a fresh start," Nahles said in a statement.

Nahles, who led the SPD from 2009 to 2018, said she would step down as leader of the party on June 17, when a new leader will be elected by SPD members to replace her.

"I have been a proud member of the SPD for over 30 years, and I am deeply committed to the party’s values and principles," Nahles said. "But I believe that now is the time for a new leadership to take over."

A senior former bureaucrat of India’s anti-corruption watchdog, Comptroller and Auditor General (CAG), has slammed the government for its role in making democracy a “joke”.

Indira Gandhi

In an open letter published in local newspapers, retired CAG officer Indira Gandhi said that the government had “usurped” the role of the opposition and was acting as if it was a “super authority”.

“I am a former officer of the Comptroller and Auditor General of India. I have seen the government at work, and I am appalled by what I see,” she wrote.

“I have seen the government make decisions that are not in the best interest of the country, and I am worried that this trend will continue in the future.”

Gandhi’s letter comes as the government is under scrutiny for its handling of the coronavirus pandemic and the economy.

The government has been accused of taking insufficient steps to contain the virus, and of not providing enough support to those who have lost their jobs.

The government has also been criticized for its handling of the economy, with many Indians struggling to make ends meet.

Gandhi said that the government should be held accountable for its actions, and that it should be transparent about its decision-making process.

“People deserve to know why certain decisions are being made, and how they are being implemented,” she said.

“I am worried that the government is becoming too powerful, and too far removed from the people. It is time for change.”

The government has denied any wrongdoing, and has said that it is doing everything it can to help those who are affected by the pandemic.

On the economic front, the government has announced several measures to support the economy, including a stimulus package worth $2.2 trillion.

However, many economists and experts have criticized the government for not doing enough to address the underlying issues of high unemployment and poverty.

Gandhi said that the government should be held accountable for its actions, and that it should be transparent about its decision-making process.

“People deserve to know why certain decisions are being made, and how they are being implemented,” she said.

Why the EU election was a win for Macron

By Zaki Laïdi

Though the final tally might seem to suggest otherwise, the European parliament elections were a strategic success for French President Emmanuel Macron.

First, Macron succeeded in framing the election as a contest between progressive populists. Though he has been attacked at home in recent months — including by some on his own “dias” — it is worth mentioning that this message did not emerge out of thin air. Rather, it was shaped by the rise of the far-rightEuropean Union (UE), which left-wing forces were careful to attack but did not harmoniously present a collective alternative. Rather than face the populist surge head on, Macron’s party decided to engage in an electoral war against it.

Historically, the Republics on the right and the Socialists on the left have dominated French politics. Yet these parties’ combined share of the popular vote was under 25%, whereas Macron’s La République En Marche (LREM) winned 38% of the seats in the French National Assembly (formerly the French National Front up to 13%). Behind these figures is an unprecedented collapse of the mainstream French right, which has failed to recreate its identity as a party of traditional conservatism. Though some French conservatives have sought to rejoin the National Rally, much of the centre-right electorate has given up hope.

The result means that Macron can now assert leadership over a pivotal centrist parliamentary group of 110 members.

French President Emmanuel Macron’s party will now be able to claim leadership over a pivotal centrist parliamentary group of 110 members.

In the last European elections in 2014, the nationalist parties represented only 44% of the seats in the European Parliament. As a result, the system is a first-past-the-post mechanism in a proportionally elected parliament. This is why, without majority support, the French President’s party will be able to cooperate with other centrist parties to block the far-right party’s influence in the European Parliament.

In the 2014 European elections, the French President’s party was not able to form a majority alliance with the centrist, liberal and democrat parties. While the spitzenkandidaten had promised to stop the far-right party, they were reluctant to confront the European peoples’ political divide. The result was a significant increase in support for the Greens, which benefited from a historic level of youth participation. The French far-right has thus replicated in the European Parliament the surge in support for the Greens, which benefited from a historic level of youth participation.

The election provides a check on the French right, while lengthening them for Michel Platini, the former UEFA president. In this year’s election, he was weakened by the political demise of Austrian Chancellor Sebastian Kurz, whose government was the result of a political deal brokered by Francois Fillon, former prime minister of France.

While the National Rally performed well, the French President’s party performed well and the far-right wing of the European Parliament (UE) fell short. This result gives a power to the President of the European Parliament. It is likely to be followed by another, and will thus work to Macron’s advantage. The election is a first-party mechanism in a proportionally elected parliament, and the Greens are expected to take the lead in the European Parliament (UE) and to free up many candidates for, and to seek to win, the 2019 European elections.

While the far-right party saw its support fall, the Greens remained strong. This result suggests that Macron’s progressive-European electorate will support him in the 2019 European elections.

India’s giant Modo wave: why we didn’t see it coming

But the situation still wasn’t clear when the Modi wave was building.
