WHO sounds warning on Ebola outbreak in eastern DR Congo

By Ben Simon, AFP

The World Health Organization yesterday declared a dangerous outbreak of hemorrhagic fever in eastern Congo a global health emergency, a designation only used for the greatest threats.

The Ebola epidemic in DR Congo, the worst recorded on record, has long been captured to worsen, but this week saw a new person confirmed, bringing the total in the affected region to 1,064, according to the major emergency of the world.

To “It is time for the world to take notice,” WHO Director-General Tedros Adhanom Ghebreyesus said in a statement, as he accepted the advice of his advisory board and declared the emergency for the first time since 2014.

“This is an emergency of international concern, and the situation is rapidly evolving,” said the emergency committee for the outbreak. “We will not be silent until the government acts.”

The WHO’s international health regulations, adopted in 2017, mandate that the emergency committee should issue a warning or a declaration.

A WHO panel in April reviewed the situation and found it to be a global emergency, but determined that it had not yet reached the level of a pandemic.

The emergency committee’s advice was based on a range of factors, including the potential for the virus to spread to other countries, the ongoing conflict in the region, and the lack of access to healthcare facilities.

“WHO is on thin ice, with limited options in making the call for global action,” the emergency committee said in its statement. “We will not be silent until the government acts.”

The emergency committee is tasked with providing advice to the WHO director-general on the need for health regulations, drafted in 2007, to protect the health of the population.

The emergency committee’s advice was also based on a range of factors, including the potential for the virus to spread to other countries, the ongoing conflict in the region, and the lack of access to healthcare facilities.

House votes to condemn Trump racist comments

By Jerome Foster II, AP

WASHINGTON (AP) - House Democrats have voted to condemn President Donald Trump for racist tweets, with Speaker Nancy Pelosi saying the tweets were "wrong and offensive." The resolution went to the full House Thursday for a vote.

The measure would be the most direct condemnation yet of Trump's tweets, which denigrated four Democratic congresswomen of color. Pelosi called the tweets "appalling." Trump accused Pelosi of "talking about our great country from the outside" and said he had a "right to talk about our policies from other countries as well."

Trump was also criticized for referring repeatedly to the four Democratic congresswomen of color as "anti-Semitic." Pelosi said the four women "are not anti-Semitic" and that the resolution was "a moral imperative to call out racism and xenophobia wherever it occurs in our land.

The four congresswomen — all of whom are from states in the U.S., are women, Arab, or of color — have been part of a progressive wing of the Democratic party. They have been outspoken about immigration, calling the administration's policies cruel.

The resolution would also call on Trump to stop the racist tweets. Pelosi said the tweets were "un-American" and that Trump "has a right to talk about our policies from other countries as well. But his threats, his baseless allegations, his incitements to hatred and his bullying tactics were wrong.

The Democrats have said Trump's tweets were racist and could be a violation of the Civil Rights Act.

But the resolution is unlikely to be considered. It's unclear whether the 435-member House but are expected to be in Congress or the United States of America in 2019.

Democrats hold a majority in the chamber that recently overtook Republicans in 2018. The House has a tight margin in the election this year.

The number of small schools in England has fallen by more than 10,000 since 2008, according to an analysis published today by the House of Commons Library, there has been a dramatic reduction in the number of small schools in England with 200 or less pupils for the first time in almost 20 years.

London house prices fall at fastest rate in 10 years

Across the country as a whole, house price inflation dipped from 1.5% in April to 1.2% in May, with the highest regional growth recorded in the north-west (4.3%) and the north-east (3.7%).

The average cost of a house in London was £954,000, down £20,000 on the previous year. The average cost of a home in the south-east was £450,000, down £3,000 on the previous year.

Mike Flaherty, the head of research at the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors, said that house prices inflation is running below the official forecast of 2% for the period of living, which remained at 1.2% in the north-east.

Pompeo's visit to focus on security, migration

This is the Trump administration’s latest attempt to ail Panama, a friendly neighbor, and it comes just weeks before the US president makes his first official trip to the Western Hemisphere.

Trump said the US would take a "full suite of actions" to address the crisis involving the US "national interest," which he said "states of security" were threatening.

The administration has been planning to take action for months, and it is expected to announce new restrictions on the number of migrants allowed into the US as early as this week.

The plan would also impose new sanctions on countries that do not cooperate with the US in handling migrants, and it could include a ban on the entry of any new migrants from the region.

The administration has also been planning to impose new restrictions on the number of asylum seekers allowed into the US, with the goal of reducing the number of migrants allowed into the US to zero.

The new rules are expected to be announced later this week, and they are likely to be opposed by other countries in the region, including Mexico and Guatemala.

The administration is also expected to announce new restrictions on the number of children allowed into the US, with the goal of reducing the number of migrants allowed into the US to zero.

Celebrate Apollo 11, but also find a way to launch new adventures

The 50th anniversary of the Apollo 11 launch was on Tuesday, the landing was on July 20.

Those who witnessed the events might well be nostalgia for a day when American dreams were a matching adventure among the stars.

Today, there is no moon landing as the greatest single human achievement of the 20th century. It really was a remarkable feat, a journey from the earth to the moon eight years after a brash young president dared the nation to try to do it.

The landing was watched on TV by some 600mn around the world – one in every six people on the planet saw it happen.

The world was changing, and still is, emotionally and economically invested in space exploration, probably more so than anywhere else in the world. So one enjoys the celebration of memory along with everyone else, while wondering, what's next?

There’s the problem. Our tribal instincts are so close to the surface that even in a world where many people don’t even want to give an idea a chance, we want to fuss with each other, troll each other.

If we’re going to go on any more adventures together – whether on this planet or away from it – we’re going to have to come together.

The alternative is a future where America looks back 10 years from now and finds nothing to celebrate. - Tribute News Service

Tackling migration: Fork is mightier than the wall

By Danielle Nierenberg

The world “migrant” carries images of war, natural disaster, and severe economic distress. All are important reasons why people seek refuge from their homelands. But some migration may well be food – or, rather, the lack of it.

As of 2015, some 62mn people worldwide – about one in every nine – faced chronic food deprivation. While some progress has been made to reduce chronic hunger, the overall number of chronically hungry people continues to grow.

“The link with migration is clear. When people in Africa, the Middle East, and Latin America cannot feed themselves and their families, they often leave home. According to a study by the United Nations World Food Programme, in 2015 a point increase in food insecurity increased refugee flows by 6%.”

Those facing food insecurity often experience conditions of hunger in the Arab world, “food riots” have erupted regularly since the mid-2000s. For example, in Egypt, Tunisia, and Jordan, the extra food available in the regional market triggered the Arab Spring protests that began in Tunisia in 2010.

It isn’t just food shortages were not enough to motivate a person to migrate, the swelling social unrest and conflict often are, not least because they further strain food supplies. As the WFP reports, food insecurity’s a significant determinant of the incidence and severity of armed conflict. Over one in ten armed conflicts are food related, more than 70% of such conflicts increase numbers by 6%.

According to the Observatory on Food and Migration, many migrants are single men, who have their female relatives behind them to run their depleted farms. In South Africa, women now account for 30% of farm workers in the country’s agricultural sector. In the US, 60% of agricultural workers are similarly exploited – often already benefitted from government subsidies, which encourage them to produce too much food.

“The surplus food may be exported (for exorbitant fees) from their homes to East Asia, and the Pacific – some of the food is lost and wasted, with four countries from such region ranking in the top 20. Ethiopia, Kenya, and India also are among the countries with strong strategies for minimizing food loss.”

A challenge as complex as migration cannot be addressed simply through strict immigration laws, it has to be a whole-way-like the one US President Donald Trump seeks to build on his country’s southern frontier with Mexico. Instead, policymakers must tackle migratory workers’ conditions, while at the same time harnessing a global food system.

For developing-country governments, that means wrestling agriculture subsidies and implementing targeted policies to reduce food loss and waste. Developing-country governments, for their part, must channel state resources to mitigate gender inequality.

These are little laws – and food – to waste. Project Syndicate

The exploitation time bomb

By Jacob Rees-Mogg

Since 1990, the FDA has been marketed as heart healthy. But today, said Dr David Spence, a researcher at Omer Kucuk, a researcher at Emory University in Atlanta, the statement is no longer valid. The FDA announced in October 2020 that it would no longer consider soy products, including soy-based foods, to have a substantive health claim. This was a significant victory for consumer advocacy groups, which had been lobbying for the removal of this claim for years.

The FDA’s decision was based on a review of the evidence that soy products can reduce the risk of heart disease. While there is some scientific evidence to support this claim, the FDA concluded that the evidence was not strong enough to support a substantive health claim.

This decision has been met with mixed reactions. Some health advocates have praised the FDA for its strong stand on evidence-based decision-making. Others have criticized the FDA for being too slow to respond to new scientific evidence.

The lack of a substantive health claim for soy products will have a significant impact on the soy industry. Soy products are a major source of revenue for many companies, and the loss of the health claim will likely lead to a decrease in sales.

However, the FDA’s decision is likely to have a larger impact than just on the soy industry. It is a sign that the FDA is willing to take a strong stand on evidence-based decision-making, even if it means going against the wishes of some powerful groups.

In the future, we can expect the FDA to continue to take a strong stand on evidence-based decision-making. This will likely lead to a decrease in the number of substantive health claims for food products. However, it is important to remember that the FDA’s decisions are based on the best available evidence, and that consumers should always be aware of the limitations of scientific evidence.
