Diabetes prevention project set to begin

The region’s largest diabetes research project, the Qatar Diabetes Prevention Programme, is set to begin in early 2019 following a round of a five-year funding by Qatar Foundation’s Qatar National Research Fund.

The programme is co-funded by Hamad Medical Corporation (HMC) through the Academic Health System Research Institute (AHSRI) and Qatar National Research Fund through diabetes prevention in Qatar and will start recruitment in early 2019.

It is composed of seven complementary sub-projects. Project 1 aims to present the proportion of pre-diabetes into Type 2 diabetes; Project 2 aims to find the best method to predict progression of pre-diabetes into Type 2 diabetes; Project 3 aims to carry out a diabetes prevention random-controlled trial in patients with newly diagnosed Type 2 diabetes; Project 4 aims to identify genetic factors associated with pre-diabetes; Project 5 aims to identify proteomic and metabolomic markers associated with pre-diabetes and Type 2 diabetes and Project 7 aims to develop eHealth tools and evaluate mobile apps to support lifestyle intervention for diabetes prevention and management.

"Diabetes is one of the most pressing health conditions in Qatar. It is estimated that at least 17% of the adult Qatar population has diabetes and this number is expected to rise. We need to change behaviour and address the risk factors associated with diabetes," said Prof. Abo-Samra, director of the Qatar Metabolic Institute, chairman of Internal Medicine at HMC and director of the QDPP.

"QFDP addresses the full spectrum of issues related to the development of diabetes and this research will identify genetic and molecular factors associated with pre-diabetes diabetes, and will develop eHealth tools and evaluate mobile apps to support lifestyle interventions for diabetes prevention and management."

A new study by the University of California, San Francisco, has found that when there is an emergency in a region, people are more likely to act in ways that are beneficial to others. However, when there is no emergency, people are more likely to act in ways that are detrimental to others.

The report, published in the journal Social Science & Medicine, found that when a region is experiencing an emergency, such as a natural disaster, people are more likely to help others and to contribute to the common good.

The study, which involved surveys of more than 1,000 people in the United States and Canada, found that when there was an emergency, people were more likely to donate money to charity and to volunteer their time. However, when there was no emergency, people were more likely to spend their money on themselves and to avoid helping others.

The authors of the study, led by Professor Karen Davis, said that their findings suggest that people are more likely to act in ways that are beneficial to others when they are faced with a crisis. They also suggest that policies that encourage people to act in ways that are beneficial to others, such as those that provide incentives for charitable giving, may be effective in promoting social cohesion.

The study has implications for policy makers, who can use it to design policies that encourage people to act in ways that are beneficial to others. For example, policies that provide tax incentives for charitable giving could be effective in promoting social cohesion.

The study also has implications for individuals, who can use it to understand when they are more likely to act in ways that are beneficial to others. For example, people may be more likely to help others when they are facing a crisis, such as a natural disaster, and less likely to help others when they are not facing a crisis.

Finance minister Philip Hammond yesterday said he would resign if Boris Johnson became prime minister because he does not believe the country has the means to leave the EU without a deal. But parliamentary opposition was “united” in its view that the possibility of a no-deal Brexit is not over yet, even if the government is not.

An-Geigi, the speaker in the House of Commons, said: “The Brexit situation is far from over.” He added: “The decision to leave the EU was made by a great many people who have spoken out against it.”

U ternational pressure grew on the German government yesterday to send aid and support to migrants making the perilous journey across the Mediterranean sea — after the Italian government, which has long taken a hard line on migration issues, rejected a request from French NGO SOS Mediterranee to return to the central Mediterranean to continue search and rescue operations.

SOS Mediterranee said the migrants were wanting to "escape the conflict in Libya and the deplorable conditions of Libya’s detention centers".

The new operation comes exactly a month after the tragic incident in Libya, in which at least 42 children and 33 adults were killed and 463 wounded in a highway accident after the driver of a packed moving truck lost control of the vehicle.

The Italian government has long been a vocal opponent of the rescue missions run by the NGOs, but has faced criticism for its own poor treatment of migrants and those seeking refuge in Europe.

The decision by Italy's new government, led by the Five Star Movement and the League, to refuse permission to return to the central Mediterranean is a significant blow to the humanitarian efforts in the Mediterranean.

This comes as the European Union faces increasing pressure from member states to crack down on illegal immigration and to find a more sustainable solution to the migration crisis.

The decision by Italy's government to suspend the operations of SOS Mediterranee and Doctors Without Borders (MSF) has raised concerns about the safety and well-being of the migrants who are risking their lives on the dangerous journey across the Mediterranean.

SOS Mediterranee has been operating in the Mediterranean for over a decade, and has rescued thousands of migrants who have been abandoned by traffickers or have been left to fend for themselves in the middle of the sea.

The new decision by Italy is likely to be met with widespread criticism from global leaders and human rights organizations, who have long been calling for a more humane and compassionate approach to migration.

Meanwhile, the European Union isexpected to meet later this week to discuss proposals for a new migration deal with African countries, and to find a way to share the burden of the migration crisis among member states.

March 18, 2023, Chile has turned to advertising to attract battery makers for its lithium, as the world’s third-largest lithium producer, is keen to boost its output amid strong demand for the clean energy metal.

Chile is the world’s leading producer of lithium, the key ingredient in the batteries that power electric vehicles and renewable energy systems. The country’s lithium industry has faced challenges in recent years, with political and regulatory changes leading to a drop in output.

Chile’s government has been working to attract foreign investment to boost its lithium production. It is hoping to reach a lithium output of 1.1 million tonnes by 2025, up from 740,000 tonnes in 2022.

The government has said it will offer incentives to foreign companies to invest in lithium projects. It has also established a special economic zone for lithium producers to provide tax breaks and other incentives.

Marcos eyes review of Mindanao

The Philippines' President Ferdinand Marcos Jr. has signaled a review of Mindanao's autonomous region law, raising concerns among human rights groups who say the region has made progress in ending violence and poverty.

Marcos, who took office in June 2022, has previously expressed interest in revising the autonomous region law for Mindanao, which includes the Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao (ARMM) and the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF). The law gives the region greater autonomy and control over its affairs, including education, health, and development projects.

The Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao (ARMM) was established under the 1987 Constitution of the Philippines, which granted the region more autonomy than other regions in the country. The ARMM was dissolved in 2008, and was replaced by the Bangsamoro Autonomous Region (BARMM) in 2019.

Marcos' review of the autonomous region law comes after he signed a decree establishing the Bangsamoro Autonomous Region (BARMM) in 2019, which replaced the ARMM. The BARMM was established as part of a peace accord signed in 2014 between the Philippine government and the Moro National Liberation Front (MNLF), a guerrilla group that fought against the government for decades.

The MNLF and other rebel groups were granted representation in the national government and control over parts of Mindanao as part of the peace agreement. The BARMM was expected to provide greater autonomy and self-governance to the region, which has a long history of conflict and violence.

However, human rights groups and critics have raised concerns about the BARMM, saying it has not delivered on its promises to end violence and poverty in the region. Despite the establishment of the BARMM, violence and poverty remain major problems in the region, with many residents living in poverty and lacking access to basic services.

Marcos' review of the autonomous region law could have implications for the future of the BARMM and the region's autonomy. It is not clear what changes Marcos might propose, but his move is likely to be closely watched by human rights groups and other stakeholders in the region.
Raising Philippines’ tourism profile on the world stage

Thanks to the hard work of the Philippines’ Department of Tourism (DoT) Secretary Berna Romulo-Puyat, and with a little luck, the nation could host the world stage by being the host nation for two of the world’s most important tourism conferences in time for the 100th anniversary of Magellan’s landing in Cebu.

Under Puyat’s direction, the DoT has bid to host the annual World Tourism Organization (WTO) Assembly in April of 2022. The WTO is an agency of the United Nations dedicated to promoting “sustainable, inclusive and accessible tourism throughout the world. The organisation currently has 158 member-states, six from around the world. The summit this year was held in Seville, Spain, and will move to Puerto Rico in 2020.

The UNWTO is a group comprising tourism enterprises and advocates from the private sector. Its Global Summit, held every year in April, draws from 1,500 to 1,700 delegates from around the world. Given the country’s remarkable biodiversity, the sensitivity of the environment to climate change and the country’s economic growth as a whole, it is not surprising that the Philippines’ voice in these important policymaking bodies is valuable, not just for the country’s own sake, but for the insights it can share with the world.

This perspective is evidently shared by the Philippines’ peers as well. Both the UNWTO Committee on Asia and the Pacific (GPAC) and the UNWTO Committee on South Asia (CASA) have offered their endorsement of the Philippines’ bid to host the 2022 UNWTO General Assembly. The Manila Times

The Philippines is, indeed, the best location to host these two important conferences.

From a commercial point of view, the Philippines’ profile as a tourist destination has expanded tremendously over recent years and continues to fortify under the DoT’s current leadership. Visitor arrivals have steadily increased and are presently at record levels. High-profile sustainability initiatives from the private sector have bolstered the Philippines’ good reputation.

In terms of policy, the Philippines is making greater influence than ever before, particularly in the UNWTO. This perspective is evidently shared by the Philippines’ peers as well. Both the UNWTO Committee on Asia and the Pacific (GPAC) and the UNWTO Committee on South Asia (CASA) have offered their endorsement of the Philippines’ bid to host the 2022 UNWTO General Assembly.

In Biden and Bernie Sanders are two of the most prominent candidates in the race to the White House. Sanders, a Senator from Vermont, has positioned himself as a member of the “ Bernie Sanders for a future that is more progressive and inclusive.”

Biden, on the other hand, is the incumbent front-runner for the Democratic nomination. While Sanders has been a consistent advocate for policies such as Medicare for All, Biden has been more cautious on the issue, stating that he supports a public option that would allow for competition with private insurance companies.

Both candidates have been criticized for their lack of a clear plan for addressing climate change. Sanders has called for a “green New Deal” that would create millions of jobs while addressing climate change, while Biden has promised to “build back better” with a focus on infrastructure and job creation.

Sanders has also been criticized for his support of universal healthcare, with some arguing that it would cost too much and others that it would lead to long wait times for care.

In contrast, Biden has been criticized for his support of the Affordable Care Act, which has been credited with lowering healthcare costs and expanding coverage. However, he has also been criticized for his support of the “public option” plan, which would allow for greater competition and lower costs.

The two candidates have also been criticized for their lack of a clear plan for addressing economic inequality. Sanders has called for a wealth tax on the ultra-wealthy, while Biden has supported a more moderate approach.

The US presidential campaign is in full swing, with both candidates vying for the nomination and the subsequent presidency. The future of the country is at stake, and the decisions made now will have far-reaching consequences for generations to come.

For years on end, the conventional wisdom was that rich countries were responsible for climate change, and it was widely assumed that the poor would suffer its greatest impact. As new dynamics emerged, and the world changed, the picture grew more complex, and the poor began to affect the rich.

Josoor Institute passes the 4,000-beneficiary mark

The first half of 2019 has been "exceptionally successful" for Josoor Institute, according to its executive director, Afraa al-Noaimi. The institute passed the 4,000-beneficiary mark for leaders in sports and events industry stakeholders and net-works in the region.

"The overall experience and outcome of the Executive Development Programme is now past the half-way mark. The programme was designed for leaders in sports and events industry. It is delivered over three non-consecutive weeks in three different cities. Participants met in Doha for the launch event on 2 June, and will finish the programme at the end of the month.
