As was evident in a report last week, the story of two Syrian girls, Riham and Rowane, who were rescued from under rubble after an air strike in Ariha, in northwestern Syria, is not unique. The war in Syria has killed more than 400,000 people, the United Nations said yesterday, as the government and its allies increased the intensity of aerial bombardment of the occupied region, causing casualties among civilians and aid workers in the region.

But what was the story of these two girls -- Riham, 5, and Rowane, 7 -- has an added layer of poignancy. It resonated with the untold stories of many other children who have been injured and killed during the conflict, as well as the plight of millions of families displaced from their homes.

Riham and Rowane were caught in the crossfire of a conflict that has lasted for seven years, and the world has largely looked the other way.

Honduran army overrun by dengue fever epidemic

O f Honduras’ 12 public hospitals in the western city of La Paz have run out of beds, leaving patients with no place to go, health authorities said on Friday, calling the worst dengue fever epidemic in recent memory.

The city has struck 100,000 people, mostly children, in the last half-century.

The disease has struck 28,000 people this year, causing a public health crisis.

Aid agencies say the outbreak is not yet under control.

Crista Alexandra Pinuela, age seven, is one of the children whose health is worsening in the hospital’s inner ward. She was admitted on Friday afternoon after being taken to the hospital by ambulance.

She is now in a critical condition, her father said.

“Her health is worrying hospital staff,” the most. She was admitted by her parents, who are now caring for her at home.

“Marta Zoila Lopez, 58, said she had no choice but to stay at home in Guaymas, because of the shortage of hospital beds.

“We are forced to stay here because of the shortage of beds, and the disease is spreading rapidly,” she said.

The disease has killed more than 100,000 people in recent years, causing a humanitarian crisis.

The government has announced plans to increase hospital capacity and provide more medical supplies.

However, the outbreak is not expected to peak for several more weeks, according to the World Health Organization.

Washington

The US House of Representatives passed a bill to grant Temporary Protected Status (TPS) to Venezuelans, a move expected to help alleviate the economic crisis in the Latin American country.

The bill passed by a vote of 335-80, with 39 Republicans and one independent joining 236 Democrats in favor.

The bill, sponsored by Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart, R-Fla., and Darren Soto, D-Fla., heads to the US Senate for consideration later this year before the House supports a similar measure.

If there is any population that meets the absolute statutory definitions of being granted TPS, it is the Venezuelan people,” said Rep. Chip Roy, R-Texas, who represents one of the state’s congressional districts.

The bill would extend TPS for an additional six months and allow Venezuelan nationals to apply for work permits.

Colombian President Ivan Duque had previously announced the creation of a new humanitarian visa for Venezuelans who want to live in Colombia, but the plan has been met with resistance from US lawmakers.

He added that he hopes the bill will help alleviate the humanitarian crisis in Venezuela.

Pakistani lawmakers are divided over the issue of dual nationals holding political office. While some argue that dual citizens should be allowed to run for elections, others believe that this would undermine the integrity of the democratic process. The controversy has been ongoing for years, with the government and opposition parties taking different stances on the matter.

The government is considering allowing dual national lawmakers to hold political office. However, the decision has not been finalised yet, and the issue remains under debate. It is likely that more discussions will be held before a final decision is made.

North Korean leader Kim Jong-un's criticism of South Korea as he oversee his latest missile launch this week sparked a new round of questions over the South's role in managing a nuclear dialogue between the two nations and the United States, analysts said.

South Korean President Moon Jae-in has been one of the most vocal proponents of engagement with the North, using last year's Winter Olympics to host delegations and then meeting at summit talks filled with ice-breaking imagery, smiles, and hand-holding.

But Moon's ability to continue Washington's cautious approach to easing sanctions and allow economic cooperation between the two countries remains uncertain.

Several comments in the U.S. on the North's new missile test push to strengthen its military are likely to go through greater than usual measures, analysts said.

The state media report shows the North was still willing to sit down with the United States, but Moon is now in a difficult situation given his recent diplomatic setbacks.

The North's announcement is likely to focus on the South's use of hard power and its participation in military drills with the United States.

The world needs a second Green Revolution that is different and more of a unified Europe that is not held back by the lowest common denominator, or able to stand up for itself while working toward a world of peaceful and sustainable world order.
The long view of China

By Stephen S. Roach

A couple of months ago, while touring China, I came upon a small old house in the village of 59 Datong made reference to an old, nongovernmental organization that had a new Long March, and we should make a new start of it. I was in response to the mounting economic conflict with the United States.

In China, economic conflict has gone beyond the constraints of political statements. Speaking in the same province where the Long March was initiated in 1934, and heading to Mao’s birthplace of the Nationalists 15 years later, I could feel the greatest strength of the long view. That strength was on display during my latest visit to China in early July, a series of wide-ranging meetings and discussions. The China i...
