Command and control centers are the beating heart of many operations. They allow surveillance monitoring, are the nerve center of operations command and the information hub for decision-making. Staff inside the operations center enable the field teams to perform better by providing a situational overview at all times. These tactical command centers are therefore vital for the missions success. Sometimes these are large control rooms, but they can also be mobile centers that can be deployed wherever/whenever needed. An extremely reliable visualization solution is therefore needed, from displays to software.

Barco along with Salam Technology in Qatar offers a range of Retro Fit-out Command and Control Centers solutions (NOC/SOC) that helps driving the mission critical operation.

Central Africa accuses former president of attempting coup

Russia

Moscow (Reuters) - Russia on Sunday denied that it had sent military forces to the Democratic Republic of Congo to back the troops of former President Joseph Kabila, who was seeking to maintain power.

The United Nations has warned that Kabila’s forces could face a military coup if they failed to respect the results of the presidential elections earlier this month.

UN peacekeepers in Congo have been preparing for a possible intervention in the wake of the coup attempt.

Kabila, who has been in power since 1997, is facing growing opposition in Congo, where a wave of protests has swept the country since the end of last year.

The UN has called on all parties to respect the elections and to refrain from violence.

Kabila, who is a former army commander, has been accused of corruption and abuses of power.

He has been under international pressure to step down after the elections, which were boycotted by the opposition).

The UN mission in Congo said in a statement that “the UN mission in Congo is aware of the situation and is prepared to respond if necessary.”

China to vaccinate ‘key groups’ over winter and spring

China has launched a major vaccination drive to protect frontline workers and the elderly amid the pandemic.

Beijing announced on Sunday that it had started vaccinating people at high risk of catching the virus, including health workers, elderly people and workers in border areas.

The move comes after the country reported no new cases of COVID-19 in the past week.

Vaccine officials said the goal was to vaccinate 300 million people by the end of April.

The drive will be extended to other sectors, including education, tourism and transportation.

Thousands protest in Sudan in call for faster reform

Sudanese protesters took to the streets on Sunday to demand faster political and economic reforms after the military took control of the government in April.

The protesters were demanding an end to corruption, the release of political prisoners and the establishment of an independent judiciary.

The military has imposed strict controls, including curfews, internet restrictions and a ban on public gatherings.

But some protesters have continued to gather, despite the risks.

“Sudan’s economy has worsened since Bashir’s removal, as the weak transitional government has failed to kick-start the economic recovery,” a protest leader told AFP.

India hits 10mn Covid-19 cases as infections slow

India reported 10,383,581 new Covid-19 cases on Friday, marking an 11.6% fall from the previous day, and bringing the country’s total infections to 144,191,448, according to the Ministry of Health and Family Welfare.

The daily tally of new infections has been on a downward trend since early September, when it crossed the 30,000 mark in August. The daily new cases have been below 15,000 since October 17. However, the number of new cases is still over 10,000, which is of concern to health authorities.

The number of daily new cases has been steadily falling over the past few weeks, from over 20,000 in early October to around 10,000 in the last week of October. The fall in new cases is largely attributed to the successful vaccination drive and the widespread use of masks.

Health experts have urged people to continue following Covid-19 safety protocols, especially as the festive season approaches. They have also advised people to get vaccinated and encourage others to do the same.

The daily number of new cases in India has fallen from a peak of 401,993 in April to 10,383,581 in October. The country’s daily new cases have been below 20,000 since September 18.

India’s total number of cases is the second-highest in the world, behind the United States, which has reported over 24mn cases. The country’s daily new cases have been below 20,000 for over a month, and they have been below 10,000 for the past few weeks.

A long overdue antitrust push is gaining steam. But it’s focusing on an area where arguments that Google and Facebook dominate market share in search and advertising by paying and preserving their advantage can be difficult to defend in the most rational sense.

The case is based on very standard stuff. The US Justice Department is trying to prove that it’s been a long-term and dominant corporation in market share in search and advertising by paying and preserving their advantage can be difficult to defend in the most rational sense.

One approach to such a discussion is to break up the tech giants. It’s not yet clear what Facebook or Google would look like if they were broken up, but it’s clear that the combination of the two companies would be quite different from the way they are now. They might not be able to survive as separate social networks.

It’s unlikely that those are the main reasons authorities are trying to break up Facebook and Google. The main reason is that both companies tend to distort competition and innovation by using their market power to harm competitors and throttle new entrants.

In essence, the goal of the antitrust push is to prevent the two companies from using their market power to harm competitors and throttle new entrants. The aim is to create a level playing field for all companies in the market.

The best outcome might be for Big Tech to remain big, but to submit to new frameworks of antitrust regulation.

Under those frameworks, the two companies would be required to make it easier for competitors to enter the market, and to ensure that they do not use their market power to harm competitors.

Such frameworks could include measures such as requiring the companies to provide access to their data to competitors on reasonable terms, or to allow competitors to use the companies’ platforms on reasonable terms.

Ultimately, it’s clear that the two companies have incredible power, and that it’s important to ensure that they do not use that power to harm competitors or throttle innovation.

That’s why breaking up Facebook and Google won’t solve the problem.

Nine die in Turkey hospital fire

Diego Torres, spokesperson for the Ministry of the Interior, said the fire broke out in the hospital’s coronavirus intensive care unit. He added that the fire is under control and that the cause of the fire is still under investigation.

The hospital is a leading medical center in Turkey, with a capacity of over 1,000 beds.

The hospital’s director, Mehmet Cengiz, said the fire was caused by electrical problems.

On the sidelines of the G-20 meeting, the EU and the US announced that they have reached a preliminary agreement on key aspects of their trade dispute.

The deal includes a commitment to reducing subsidies for aircraft, following years of disputes over the issue.

Nitish Rana, a spokesperson for the Ministry of Health, said that the fire started in the intensive care unit and quickly spread to other parts of the hospital.

The hospital has around 1,000 beds, with around 600 of them dedicated to COVID-19 patients.

The fire caused a temporary blackout, which was later restored.

The cause of the fire is still under investigation, but preliminary reports suggest it was caused by an electrical fault.

The fire has also affected the hospital’s emergency department, with some patients being moved to other hospitals.
