Qatar has substantially strengthened its water infrastructure to address a critical shortage of storage. It has commissioned a number of projects to increase storage capacity, including the Inner Doha Re-sewerage Implementation Project. The project involves the construction of several wastewater plants, the expansion of the existing wastewater network and the installation of new water storage tanks. The project is expected to be completed by 2020 and will provide an additional 400,000 cubic meters of storage capacity for wastewater.

The Qatar government has also invested heavily in the development of treated wastewater reuse projects. The country has implemented several programs to encourage the use of treated wastewater for agricultural purposes, including the provision of subsidies and technical assistance. The government has also implemented regulations to ensure the safe and efficient use of treated wastewater.

The treated wastewater is treated through a multi-stage process, including primary treatment, secondary treatment, and tertiary treatment. The treated wastewater is then stored in large tanks before being distributed to farmers for irrigation. The treated wastewater is used to irrigate a variety of crops, including vegetables, fruits, and grains.

The use of treated wastewater for agriculture has several benefits. It helps reduce the demand for fresh water, reduces the amount of treated wastewater that is dumped into the sea, and improves the quality of the land and soil. The treated wastewater is also rich in nutrients, making it a valuable source of fertilizer.

The success of the treated wastewater reuse program in Qatar has inspired other countries to adopt similar initiatives. The United Arab Emirates, Turkey, and Israel are among the countries that have implemented similar programs to reduce their water footprint and promote sustainable agriculture.
The Qatar Red Crescent Society (QRCS) has completed a project to support the food security and livelihood needs of rural families in southern parts of Nepal.

Under the project, local farmers and small landlords received equal supplies of basic agricultural resources, such as seeds and fertilizers, to enable them to work on plots of the object poverty, low standard of living, and lack of government subsidies.

Priority was given to the poorest Asian countries, with a long history of natural and recurrent disasters. Under the strategy of empowering the vulnerable and building safe and resilient communities, QRCS began operating in Nepal in 2013, with water and sanitation projects.

In the aftermath of the 2015 earthquake, a representation mission was established to undertake emergency responses. The scope of work was expanded to include food security, health care, shelter, and emergency supplies. So far, these operations have benefited around 1.7mn persons, with a total expenditure of $2.9mn.

Lima. (Reuters) - Peru will vote in coming weeks on whether to allow a check on the president’s authority amid a push by authorities to prevent further protests over the government’s handling of the coronavirus pandemic.

The government has faced opposition from within the ruling party and from opposition lawmakers, who have accused it of using the virus as an excuse to expand its powers.

In a statement released by the president’s office on Sunday, the government said that the vote would be held on September 26 and that it would be conducted electronically.

The vote is a response to protests that have taken place in recent weeks, including a massive demonstration on August 15 that was the largest in Peru in recent memory.

The protests were sparked by anger over the government’s response to the pandemic and its handling of the economy.

The vote follows a similar one held in May, which resulted in a narrow victory for the government.

In that vote, the government won with 55% of the vote, while the opposition won with 45%.

The new vote is expected to be held in a similar format and is likely to attract a similar level of support for the government.

In preparation for the vote, the government has been working to build support among key groups, including the military, police, and business leaders.

The vote is expected to be closely watched by international observers, who are concerned about the potential for violence and instability.

Pelosi: Lawmakers to vote on curbing war powers

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, a top congressional Democrat, on Tuesday called for a vote on legislation to constrain the president's ability to go to war with Iran, as the United States and Iran remain at odds over Tehran's nuclear program.

Pelosi said she plans to introduce the measure this week, following a separate vote on the same bill that failed to pass in the Senate last month.

The bill, known as the War Powers Resolution Act, would require the president to report to Congress within 48 hours of any armed conflict and to withdraw forces within 30 days unless Congress authorizes the use of force.

It has been introduced in both chambers every Congress since 1973, but has never been enacted.

Pelosi said the legislation is critical as the United States continues to face threats from Iran.

“I am calling for an immediate vote on the War Powers Resolution Act,” Pelosi said in a statement. “We cannot afford to wait any longer for Congress to have a say on these matters.”

The resolution would be the latest in a series of attempts by Democrats to limit the president's war powers, following the 2020 election that saw a surge in demand for accountability.

The bill is expected to face resistance from Republicans, who have accused Democrats of overreach and a failure to support the military.

Pelosi said she plans to work with both parties to ensure the legislation is passed.

“I am committed to ensuring that Congress has a say in any major military decisions,” Pelosi said.

The vote comes as tensions between the United States and Iran have escalated in recent months, with both countries blaming each other for recent attacks.

The United States has threatened to further limit its diplomatic ties with Iran, while Iran has vowed retaliation.

In Europe, there has been growing concern that the tensions could destabilize the region and lead to more violence in the Middle East.

Pelosi said she plans to continue working with other countries to address the situation.

“I am working with my counterparts in Europe to ensure that we are working together to de-escalate tensions and prevent further conflict,” Pelosi said.

The vote is expected to take place in the coming days and is likely to attract significant media attention.

Pelosi said she plans to use the opportunity to underscore the need for a more robust approach to foreign policy.

“I am calling for a more responsible approach to foreign policy, one that prioritizes the interests of the American people and the security of our allies,” Pelosi said.

The vote comes as the United States continues to grapple with the fallout from the pandemic, which has hit the country particularly hard.

Pelosi said she plans to use the vote as a chance to highlight the need for continued support for the health care system.

“The American people have made it clear that we need to ensure that we have the resources we need to continue to support our health care workers,” Pelosi said.

Smoke stalls rescues as Australia plans for next fiery onslaught

Australians of all ages headed to the funeral in Sydney for a young woman who died of smoke inhalation after the country endured its worst bushfire season in history, with more than 100 people confirmed dead in a disaster that has already caused more than A$100bn in insured losses.

The aged-care resident died in hospital on Wednesday, two days after she was injured in a fire that engulfed her home in New South Wales. She was the latest of at least 30 people to die in the worst bushfire season on record, which has been described as "catastrophic".

A 36-year-old woman died in hospital on Wednesday after being rescued from a burning house in Victoria's central region.

By the time the teenager died on Wednesday, the country's bushfire season had caused at least 21 deaths, more than 2,000 injuries and 100,000 people had been evacuated, with more than 1,500 homes destroyed.

Five people have died in Victoria, five in New South Wales and one in South Australia, according to the Bureau of Meteorology.

This year's fires have been described as the worst in 40 years, with more than 140,000 hectares burned in Victoria and more than 300,000 hectares in New South Wales.

Firefighters have been working around the clock to contain the blazes, which have been fuelled by a combination of drought, extreme heat and strong winds.

The toll of lives lost and homes destroyed has been heightened by the country's lack of preparation and response to the crisis, with many people still not having the necessary equipment or knowledge to survive such a disaster.

Prime Minister Scott Morriss said that the bushfires were "yet another reminder of the urgency for action on climate change".

"Too many people have died this fire season. Too many homes have been lost. Too many jobs have been lost. Too many communities have been devastated," he said.

"We must do better. We must act now. We must act boldly."

The government has announced a $2bn national recovery fund to help communities affected by the bushfires, with $1bn to be used for physical infrastructure and $1bn for mental health and support services.

The fund will be managed by the National Recovery and Resilience Agency, which was established in December to coordinate the response to the bushfires.

The agency will work with local councils, state and territory governments, and other partners to identify and deliver projects that will help rebuild communities and businesses.

The government has also announced a $1bn package to support the mental health and wellbeing of communities affected by the bushfires.

The package includes $500m for mental health services and $500m for community-based support services.

The government has also announced a $250m package to support the mental health and wellbeing of firefighters and emergency workers.

The package includes $100m for support services and $150m for training and education.

Killing Charlie: the attacks that heralded France's year of terror

By Damien Gayle

The Kouachi brothers who attacked the French satirical weekly Charlie Hebdo on Friday night were a perfect example of the new breed of homegrown Islamist radicals who have become a top target for Jews in France since 2015, their crimes confirming fears that French Muslims may have turned to the jihadists who have attacked the country in such a ferocious way.

A similar incident occurred in 2011, when two French Jews were killed at the Jewish supermarket, Hyper Cacher in Paris, by a man with a AK-47 rifle and a knife.

The Kouachi brothers, who killed 11 people in this week’s attack on Charlie Hebdo, claimed in a video that they were the killers of the three Jews and that they had carried out the attack because of the magazine’s cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad.

The incident was highlighted by a group of 12 Israelis over the weekend at the main train station in Paris, where they lined up holding placards saying “I am Charlie”.

But the attacks did express deep division in France over its relationship with its Muslim minority.

As far back as 2001, the French magazine 60 Millions of Men claimed that 30,000 young Muslims in France were either radicalised or activists.

The Kouachi brothers, who had been radicalised by watching Al Qaeda videos, were part of a phenomenon of young French-born Muslims who, according to one study, have become radicalised in recent years.

France remains on its second-highest alert level since 2015, their crimes confirming fears that French Muslims may have turned to the jihadists who have attacked the country in such a ferocious way.

Pakistan won't take sides in Iran-US row: Qureshi

Pakistan health authorities have declared a long weekend across the country from January 10 to 12 to balance the loss of workdays due to the coronavirus outbreak. From the 10th to the 12th, the schools across Pakistan will be closed, while the government and public offices will remain open. The decision was announced by National Institute of Health (NIH) Director-General Dr Zafar Mirza. The announcement was made after a high-level meeting was held with representatives of all educational and government bodies to discuss the proposal. The decision was taken to balance the loss of workdays due to the corona virus pandemic. The government has also decided to extend the ban on public gatherings and events, which were imposed earlier due to the pandemic. The decision was taken after considering the possibility of a second wave of the virus in the country. The announcement was made after consultations with the health experts and the government officials.

Travellers from China face checks over mystery illness

By Darwin Pesco

The Philippines has stepped up checks on travellers from China, where more than 50 people have been diagnosed with a mysterious form of viral pneumonia, after the country’s health department said yes- terday that five people had been diagnosed. At least 59 people were in critical condition, according to the Philippine Health Commission. Dr. Huang Jie, the head of the team investigating the virus in China, said today there was no evidence of significant human-to-human transmission. The illness is related to the Sars virus, which killed more than 800 people worldwide after it broke out in southern China in 2002. But health authorities said the virus is not influenza, Ebola, Middle East respiratory syndromes or Sars. The World Health Organization (WHO) has begun monitoring the outbreak, “WHO is closely monitoring the situation and is in close contact with national authorities in China,” the organisation said in a statement on Sunday. “There is limited information on the overall impact of this cluster of unknown etiology. The organization noted that so far there has been no evidence of significant human-to-human transmission.”

Marcos tells court to annul disputed votes from Mindanao

By Jr Santos

Former senator Ferdinand “Bongbong” Marcos yesterday asked the Su- preme Court to annul the com- bined precincts which were not counted, as another con- testant seeks to win the presidential poll. The First Cause of Action in- tended to nullify the May 9 elec- tion, referring to the 2019 elec- tion, which did not affect the early poll.

Marcos filed a memorandum before the high court, sitting as the Presidential Electoral Tribunal (PET), calling for a technical examination of votes’ signa- tures. He said he won by less than 1,000 votes.

Marcos, the son of the late President Ferdinand Marcos, earlier said he could prove that 2,756 precincts in Lanao del Sur, Maguindanao and Sultan Kudarat are the Third Cause of Action principle.

Under the Third Case of Ac- tion, the court will conduct an- other preliminary conference so it could proceed with the pres- entation of evidence.

Marcos is seeking to over- turn the results of the Philippines’ presidential election last May 11, arguing that he should have been declared winner. He won by less than 1,000 votes, and his rival, Antique Governor Manuel Vicente, went on to win the presidential poll.

The 2010s’ grim legacy: the decade of the far right politicians

By Cas Mudde

The past decade was the decade of the far right. In 2010, the far right was a small, fragmented, and loosely organized movement, mostly confined to the fringes of politics. By 2019, it had become a major force in many countries, driving the political agenda on immigration, security, and multiculturalism.

One of the key drivers of this rise of the far right was the global financial crisis of 2008. This crisis highlighted the inefficiency of the old political order, and the failure of the neoliberal economic and financial policies that had been in place for decades. The far right, with its focus on national sovereignty, self-sufficiency, and protectionism, was well positioned to take advantage of this moment.

In many countries, the far right was able to capitalize on the social and economic stresses that the crisis had created. The rise of the far right was particularly pronounced in Europe, where it was able to exploit the so-called “refugee crisis” of 2015, as well as the fear of terrorism that it stoked.

The far right was also able to seize on the failure of mainstream politicians to address the needs of their constituents. In many cases, the far right was the only political force that was willing to challenge the status quo, and to offer clear-cut solutions to the problems that people were facing.

Despite its successes, the far right still faces many challenges. It has struggled to translate its appeal into electoral victories, and it remains limited in terms of its ability to form government. Nevertheless, the far right has established itself as a significant force in contemporary politics, and it is likely to continue to play a major role in shaping the course of future events.

China growth really can be faster

By Nick Mytton

November 1, 2010 — China’s economic growth rate could be increased by as much as 2 percentage points in the coming years, says the country’s leading economic commentator Oliver Mytton.

Speaking at a conference in Beijing, Mytton said that China’s economic growth rate could be increased by as much as 2 percentage points in the coming years, provided that the government takes a number of steps to improve the country’s infrastructure and investment.

Mytton argued that the key to faster growth is through better infrastructure and investment, which has been declining in recent years. He said that China’s leaders should consider measures such as increasing investment in the country’s roads, railways, and other infrastructure projects.

He also said that the government should focus on improving the country’s financial system, which he said was currently too centralized and controlled by the state.

Mytton said that the government should also consider measures to increase the country’s exports, which he said had been declining in recent years.

He said that the government should consider measures such as lowering tariffs and simplifying the country’s customs procedures.

Mytton also said that the government should consider measures to increase the country’s productivity, which he said was currently too low.

He said that the government should consider measures such as increasing investment in research and development, and improving the country’s education system.

Mytton said that the government should also consider measures to increase the country’s labor force participation rate, which he said was currently too low.

He said that the government should consider measures such as lowering the country’s retirement age, and improving the country’s social security system.

Overall, Mytton said that the government should consider a number of measures to increase the country’s economic growth rate, and that these measures should be considered in the context of the country’s overall economic strategy.

The College of Islamic Studies (CIS), part of Ha- tatar University's (QU) Qatar Foundation, hosted a Winter Intensive School as part of the Madrasa Discourses Project in collaboration with the University of Notre Dame in India, US. The Winter Intensive School, open to Madrasa graduates from India and Pakistan, took place from December 25 to 30.

The full programme extends over a three-year period and provides an opportunity to engage in guided readings and discussions during weekly sessions. It is an intensive learning experience that involves understanding the historical and contemporary context of Islamic thought and its impact on how Islam is taught in the Indian subcontinent.

The participants had the chance to engage in discussions following lectures, youth critical appreciations about the past and future of Islam in South Asia. The programme included a visit to the National Library of Qatar, the Museum of Islamic Art. The Winter Intensive School is part of the Winter Intensive School of Science, Technology, and the Arts (WIS)، an educational programme in the College of Islamic Studies (CIS), part of Ha- tatar University's (QU) Qatar Foundation.
