Trump promises to make Jan. 6th a federal holiday

President Donald Trump is considering making Jan. 6, the anniversary of an assault on the US Capitol, a federal holiday. The idea has been floated by some conservative politicians, including former President Donald Trump, who has hinted at the possibility. Such a move would be unprecedented and could face significant opposition from other lawmakers and groups. The holiday would also raise questions about what it would mean to commemorate a violent event that left five people dead and hundreds injured. It is unclear whether Congress would even consider the proposal. The idea has been condemned by many as a dangerous and divisive move.

Trump's campaign to make Jan. 6th a federal holiday is part of a broader effort to capitalize on the White House's role in the attack on the Capitol. Trump has been vocal in his support of the occasion, which he has described as a day of “unity and harmony.” He has also been accused of playing a role in inciting violence at the Capitol, and his campaign has been criticized for its handling of the insurrection.

The proposal has sparked controversy and opposition from many lawmakers and groups. Some have called it a political stunt designed to distract from the violence and chaos that followed the election. Others have raised concerns about the potential for the holiday to be used as a tool for political gain or divisiveness. The proposal has also been met with skepticism from those who believe it would be impossible to create a federal holiday in the middle of the current political climate.

The idea of making Jan. 6th a federal holiday has been met with mixed reactions from the public. Some have praised the proposal as a way to commemorate a day of unity and reconciliation, while others have called it a dangerous and divisive move. The proposal has also been criticized for its potential to fuel further division and conflict.

The proper response to Jan. 6th is to work towards a future that is united and peaceful. It is important to remember the violence and chaos that followed the election and to work towards a future that is free from such events. The proposal should not be considered without careful consideration of the potential consequences and implications.

The proposal to make Jan. 6th a federal holiday has sparked controversy and debate. It is important to consider the potential consequences and implications before making such a decision. The proposal should be carefully evaluated before it is given serious consideration by lawmakers and groups.

Systematic pre-departure Covid-19 testing helps restore air connectivity

Re-establishing global air connectivity is essential to kick-start the global economy, which is currently under lockdown due to the impact of Covid-19.

The aviation industry connects the world in a unique way, adding immense value to the global economy. Aviation supports 8.3% in the world’s economic activity (16.5% of global export), and accounts for nearly 10% of global employment tied to travel and tourism. The global air transport industry is larger than both the automotive manufacturing sector and the pharmaceutical manufacturing sector. In fact, if air transport were a country, its GDP would rank 20th in the world, similar to that of Switzerland or Argentina.

International travel is down 92% on 2019 levels. Over half a year has passed since global connectivity was destroyed by the pandemic. Many jobs depend directly and indirectly — collapse below the pandemic ends.

Aviation supports $2.7tn in world economic activity way, adding immense value to the global economy.

Being dependent on travel demand, it is no surprise that the tourism and aviation sectors were hit hardest from Covid-19. The pandemic led to significant reductions in tourism activity globally. This is due to lockdowns, border closures, and other unprecedented measures put in place to safeguard national economies. According to the new issues of the World Tourism Report issued by the United Nations specialized agency, international tourist arrivals have dropped by 76% during the first quarter of 2020.

What does this abrupt and enormous decrease really mean?

These changes mean different things to different people. For the millions of travel enthusiasts that help drive the annual tourism statistics, this means that they will most likely not board airplanes this year or get the chance to travel. Many are unsure if they will see their loved ones in person again this year. In addition, businesses such as hotels, restaurants, and airlines may suffer from a lack of customers.

HIA digitally transforms the airport experience during global tourism standstill

However, for the world’s leading travel and tourism organizations, this crisis has never been so crucial. The tourism and aviation industries are part of a complex web of economic activities, with air transport providing the timely movement of people and goods. The tourism sector is heavily dependent on travel and tourism demand, and is a key source of employment for millions of people globally.

The tourism and aviation industries experienced a significant decline as a result of the coronavirus pandemic. International travel is 92% down on 2019 levels. Over half a year has passed since global connectivity was destroyed by the pandemic. Many jobs depend directly and indirectly — collapse below the pandemic ends.

Aviation supports $2.7tn in world economic activity way, adding immense value to the global economy.

The economic cost of the breakdown in global connectivity makes investing in a border-opening testing solution priority for governments. The human suffering and global economic pain of the crisis will be prolonged if the aviation industry — on which at least 65 mn jobs depend directly and indirectly — collapses below the pandemic ends.

And the amount of government support needed to avert such a collapse is rising, points out a recent report by AITA. The report claims that a cost to exceed $40bn and to post a net loss of $50bn in 2020 under a more optimistic rebound scenario than has actually occurred.

Some governments have cautiously reopened borders since then, but there has been limited uptake because of the uncertainty surrounding travel and the measures that make travel impractical or the frequent changes in Covid-19 measures make planning impossible.

To restore air connectivity, IATA has called for the development and deployment of rapid, accurate, affordable, easy-to-access, scalable and systematic Covid-19 testing for all passengers before departure as a alternative to quarantine measures.

“The key to restoring the freedom of mobility across borders is systematic Covid-19 testing of all travelers before departure. This will give governments the confidence to open their borders without placing additional risk models that cause significant changes in the rules imposed on travel. Testing all passengers will give people back their freedom to travel with confidence. And that will put millions of people back to work,” said Alexandre de Juniac, IATA’s Director General and CEO.

Some 85% of travelers in a recent ICAO Market survey conducted by IATA said they will not travel if there is a chance of being quarantined at their destination. That seems to be a very clear signal that the industry will not recover until an alternative can be found to quarantine. Many experts believe a viable alternative to quarantine is systematic 100% testing of all travelers before departure. And the same public opinion poll reveals that this is what most of the passengers prefer.
