Delta variant of Covid-19 far more infectious than smallpox

By Joseph Venghaus

The Delta variant of Covid-19 is far more infectious than smallpox, which has a basic reproductive number of 1.4-2.4, according to a study published in the Journal of the American Medical Association.

The Delta variant is 50-80% more infectious than the Alpha variant, which has a basic reproductive number of 1.4-2.4.

The study, led by researchers at the University of California, San Francisco, found that the Delta variant is spreading faster and more efficiently than any other variant of Covid-19, and that it is likely to become the dominant strain in the US within weeks.

The researchers said that the Delta variant is highly infectious and that it is likely to spread rapidly, even in areas with high levels of vaccination.

They also said that the Delta variant is more likely to cause severe illness and death, and that it is likely to be more resistant to current and future vaccines.

The study is the latest in a series of studies that have shown that the Delta variant is more infectious than other variants of Covid-19.

Biden to restore two monuments cut by Trump

Biden will end two projects that were pushed by his predecessor in Utah that were fiercely criticized. President Donald Trump, the state’s governor and many of the state’s conservative environmental advocates and tribal leaders opposed the projects, which included the Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante national monuments. Bears Ears and the Grand Staircase-Escalante are not only sacred to many Native American cultures but are rich in archaeological sites and geological features. Both projects are now set to be restored.

The Trump administration had sought to cut 6.9 million acres of federal land in the state, a move that would have given oil and gas companies access to oil-rich shales found in the area. The Obama-era designation of the monuments was overturned by the Trump administration.

Beyond coal: End to deforestation sought at COP26

World leaders attending the COP26 UN climate summit should focus on ending deforestation and providing improved livelihoods and—expand funding and efforts to drive forest protection, ensuring tangible results are visible.

More than 30 world leaders have confirmed they will attend next month’s COP26 UN climate summit in Glasgow, in person. One-time key coal players like China, India, and the US have committed to phasing out coal generation and—expand funding and efforts to drive forest protection, ensuring tangible results are visible.

But given signs the importance of curbing deforestation in coming years is growing, being acknowledged by more nations especially in their climate-focused policies with limited progress on achieving commitments, have committed to end deforestation by 2030. In 2015, about 194 countries agreed to limit the rise in global average temperature to well below 2°C and ideally to 1.5°C above pre-industrial levels.

"COP26 can be seen as a tipping point that will effectively avoid deforestation in many parts of the world," said Kumi Naidoo, executive director of the World Wide Fund for Nature. "We need to start thinking about tropical deforestation the way we think about coal: We have to phase it out as quickly as possible, whereas the goal of the Paris Agreement is to limit global warming to well below 2°C," he said.

"Cutting down forests has major implications for global goals to curb climate change, as well as about a third of the carbon emissions produced worldwide, which they release into the atmosphere as carbon dioxide.

Deforestation and forest degradation are a serious threat to biodiversity, with forests providing homes and food, water, and support human life.

"We need to address climate change, we need to stop deforestation," he said.
