Road death rate in Qatar fell by 61% per 100,000 population during 2011-2020

Road death rate in Qatar fell by 61% per 100,000 population during 2011-2020. The Hamad Trauma Centre research highlights significant road safety improvements. Research undertaken by the Hamad Trauma Centre (HTC) shows that the road death rate in Qatar fell by 61% per 100,000 population in the decade from 2011 to 2020. The research is an important contribution to the Global Road Safety Week (March 3-9), which focuses on the need for more consistent and coordinated efforts worldwide to achieve the goal of halving road deaths by 2030.

The Hamad Trauma Centre’s research found that while the population of Qatar increased by around 70% from 2011 to 2020, there was a 61% reduction in the rate of road deaths per 100,000 population. It is estimated that the decrease in road deaths corresponds to 120 fewer deaths in Qatar during the last decade. Key factors contributing to this achievement included the launch of the first Decade of Action for Road Safety (2011-2020), the establishment of the National Road Safety Committee, and collaborative efforts with the National Traffic Safety Committee.

The majority, 60%, of these road deaths occurred in the pre-hospital setting, indicating that improvements in post-crash care and trauma systems are essential. The HTC’s research highlights the need for continued efforts to enhance road safety, with a focus on new but proven interventions. In addition, we must commit to creating and maintaining a national culture of road safety and promoting safe behaviors among road users.

The Hamad Trauma Centre acknowledges the great advancements in road safety in Qatar during the first DoARS but we are committed to continuing our efforts and achieving the goal of halving road deaths by 2030.

Argentines fear the potential impact of a deal on public spending

“They have been talking for a year and a half, without concrete proposals, this is not multilateral, this is a one-way crisis solution,” Loesner said.

According to this economy minister, Martín Guzmán, has brought a new aid paradigm that will hurt the economy even after the deal with IMF is signed.

A government source told France 24 this morning that the key sticking point was the agencies and the mechanisms that would finance the debt without a “contractual spending policy.” The government instead wants to attract more funds and make funds to other lenders.

Argentina also faces an uphill battle to win back voters ahead of the presidential elections in 2023. “We are close to the 2023 presidential election after a bruising midterm defeat, which saw the government of Mauricio Macri, which has been in power for over a decade, lose its majority in Congress,” Loesner said.

However, the deal would be welcomed by the market, which has been watching the country’s currency, said Hernán Lacunza, finance minister under the previous conservative government.

In the past, public sector workers would receive salary increases periodically, but that is no longer possible due to IMF’s restrictions and trade disruptions have added to the country’s currency, said Lacunza. He said the government is considering using IMF’s new funds to widen the country’s currency.

“The deal would be welcomed by the market,” Lacunza said. “The country is still battling a terrible debt problem, a currency crisis, and the lack of reserves, which is why they don’t have the money to repay their debts.”

Hopes for Argentina IMF deal grow, but at what cost?

Laher activist Alejandro Bodart marched down the Buenos Aires province roads to protest against the international money fund, which he said threatened or actually triggered a humanitarian and legal crisis.

Bodart is on the war path again, warned that a deal to roll over – extend – the debt is not enough. He said the IMF would further push the problem of Argentina’s currency to a financial crisis.
