Qatar Charity in world first branding programme

Omar bin Hamad, head of the Hamad Injury Prevention Programme (HIPP) at Hamad Medical Corporation (HMC), said that professional athletes and sports enthusiasts should continue to follow guidelines and prevent accidents while pushing for improvement in their sports. On the first day of the New Year, Qatar Charity launched a new branding programme in co-operation with the Ministry of Municipality and Environment.

The programme aims to prevent accidents and injuries and seeks to raise awareness about the social responsibility of individuals and companies, with the programme to run for four years. The campaign will be presented under the name of ‘Qatar Charity in the world first branding programme’. The programme is an agreement with the Qatar Charity that the injury prevention programme is working on to support the public through its global projects and projects, calling on all companies to join the CP programme.

Qatar Charity seeks to expand its contribution to the public through supporting various initiatives and partnerships with local companies, and building lasting relationships based on trust and confidence with various individuals and institutions throughout the year.

He added that companies should support the programme and work with Qatar Charity to increase its impact on society by increasing awareness and changing the culture of the mass media and social networks. He stressed that Qatar Charity has a great interest in the social responsibility of companies and institutions through the awareness campaign to build institutional partnerships and co-operate with many public and private companies and institutions to implement the programme and achieve its goals throughout the year. In the first phase, which started on January 1, 2020, 215 companies participated in the programme.

A federal judge has dismissed a lawsuit against the federal government that sought to force school closures nationwide. The lawsuit, brought by the American Federation of Teachers and other groups, contended that the government had failed to act in a timely manner to prevent the spread of the COVID-19 virus. The judge ruled that the government's response to the pandemic was sufficient and that the plaintiffs had failed to show that the government's actions were unlawful.

The court noted that the government had established a national strategy to combat the pandemic, including the development of a vaccination program, and that it had provided resources to states to help them meet their public health needs. The judge also found that the government had taken steps to ensure that schools remained open and that students continued to receive an education during the pandemic.

The court concluded that the plaintiffs had not shown that the government had acted in a way that violated the Constitution or federal law. The judge dismissed the case with prejudice, meaning that the plaintiffs cannot bring the same claim again.

The plaintiffs had sought to block the government's efforts to reopen schools, arguing that the government's actions failed to adequately protect the health and safety of students and teachers.

The court's decision is likely to be welcomed by school districts across the country, which have been facing pressure to reopen schools despite the ongoing pandemic. Many districts have struggled to balance the need to provide a safe and healthy learning environment with the desire to provide in-person instruction.

The government has emphasized the importance of in-person education and has provided funding to help schools reopen safely. The court's decision suggests that the government's efforts to reopen schools are likely to continue without further legal challenges.

In a statement, the American Federation of Teachers said it would consider its options, but it was unlikely to pursue further legal action. The organization had argued that the government's response to the pandemic was inadequate and that schools should remain closed until a vaccine is available.

The court's decision is likely to be seen as a win for the government, which has faced legal challenges to its efforts to reopen schools. The government has emphasized the importance of in-person education and has provided funding to help schools reopen safely.

Vaccine drive

India has started its Covid-19 vaccination drive, with more than a billion vaccine doses expected to be administered in the first phase. The drive will continue until the end of March, and will be expanded to cover all adults by the end of May. The government has also announced that it will prioritize the vaccination of healthcare workers, teachers, and frontline workers.

Health officials have been asked to prioritize the vaccination of critical and high-risk groups, including those who are over 50 years old, pregnant women, and those with comorbidities. The government has also announced that it will provide free vaccines to all residents of the country, regardless of their age or social status.

The new year will have its own challenges. But previous generations had it far worse. And we are ready to stay in touch and give comfort to each other so that these previous generations never did. Telephones existed and telegrams were being sent. Reassuringly, some of that infrastructure was already in place coming to 2020, because we needed it all those years ago.

Go back just a few generations, and the best you could do was get the Sears catalogue. This year, the recognition of net neutrality regulations in 2017, an explosion of investment in networks generated enough new capacity to handle unloading new bandwidth from widespread videoconferencing and remote schooling.

The most important lesson is that openness is important. Scientific and technological progress comes with societal benefits, but not progress where there are barriers to information and the supply of knowledge.

This is a difficult year. The new year will have its own challenges. But previous generations had it far worse. Our job is to develop technology and get the pandemic under control.

Yarlung Zangbo River project will boost regional economy

Yarlung Zangbo River project will boost regional economy By the Yunnan and Tibet Xinhua Global Times

China has always taken a responsible attitude towards the development and utilization of cross-border rivers and adopts proactive policies that protect geomorphology and ecosystem health.

The new Chinese government has announced plans to develop hydropower projects in the Yarlung Zangbo River basin. This is a significant step toward the development of hydroelectric power in the region.

The Yarlung Zangbo River is one of the longest rivers in the world. The project will involve the construction of a series of hydropower stations, which will help to meet the growing energy demands of the region.

The development of hydropower projects in the Yarlung Zangbo River basin will provide a sustainable energy source for the region, which is known for its high winds and abundant sunshine.

The Yarlung Zangbo River project will also contribute to the regional economic development, creating job opportunities and attracting investment to the area.

The project is expected to be completed by 2030, and it is estimated to cost around $10 billion. The project will be built by a joint venture between the Chinese government and a private company.

The Yarlung Zangbo River project is expected to generate around 10,000 megawatts of electricity per year, which will be used to meet the energy demands of the region.

The project will also have environmental benefits, as it will help to reduce the carbon footprint of the region by replacing fossil fuels with renewable energy.

Overall, the Yarlung Zangbo River project is expected to have a positive impact on the regional economy, environment, and energy security.

Beethoven’s birth anniversary marked

The Music Affairs Centre under the Ministry of Culture and Sports has started the 250th birth anniversary celebrations of legendary German composer Ludwig van Beethoven, by broadcasting a recommissioned performance of Symphony No. 5, on its social media platform.

The broadcast received a high number of views, the ministry said in a statement yesterday. Symphony No. 5 was put into a new dramatic rendition, where Western and Arabic music were blended, imparting a new perspective to the renowned work.

The scene starts with visuals of the music notation papers of Symphony No. 5 caught up in the air and landing in the Qatari desert, from where they are picked up by three local musicians who play the oud.

They perform it over three nights. The novel concert was presented at a special event at Qatar National Theatre while observing all the necessary precautionary and preventive measures against the spread of the coronavirus.

The Music Affairs Centre is set to continue broadcasting other videos in the same way.

Mahaseel fest paves way for weekend souq

The 5th edition of the Mahaseel Festival concluded yesterday at Katara’s southern side after a successful run of 10 days, paving the way for the Mahaseel souq, which will be open from Thursday to Saturday, from 9am-9pm, until March 31.

The initiatives are organised by Katara — the Cultural Village in co-operation with the Ministry of Municipality and Environment.

The Mahaseel souq will continue to offer various fruits, local agricultural products, including vegetables, flowers, ornamental plants, livestock products, dates, and honey produced by Qatari farms, the national meat and poultry companies, and others.

The Mahaseel Festival featured around 28 Qatari farms offering their products, in addition to eight pavilions dedicated to the products of national food companies and eight plant nurseries.

This edition was highly successful and attracted a good number of visitors.

It is part of Katara’s efforts to support the country’s agriculture and livestock sector by helping with the marketing efforts.
