Half of Yemen under-fives face acute malnutrition, reports UN

The number of Yemeni children in danger of dying of acute malnutrition has risen to about 400,000, an increase of 22% over 2020. This has happened as the number of people in need of some form of aid for survival in Yemen is close to 80% of the 29-mn population, more than 3mn people have been displaced and tens of thousands killed. The crisis in Yemen is engulfed in a bloody power struggle that erupted in 2014 between its governing party, including a pro-Israeli bloc, and its former coalition ruling partner, a pro-Iranian bloc. The conflict is fuelled by foreign interference and a severe shortage of funding to provide the life-saving help that’s desperately needed, said Beasley. “There is a solution to the famine, and that’s food and an end to the violence.”

These numbers are yet another cry for help from Yemen, where each malnourished child also means a family struggling to survive, “World Food Programme chief David Beasley said in a joint statement. The number of Yemeni children in danger of dying of acute malnutrition has risen to about 400,000, an increase of 22% over 2020. Half of Yemen’s 400,000 children in danger of dying of acute malnutrition are projected to suf- ffer from severe acute malnutrition in 2021. “The crisis in Yemen is a man-made conflict, said Beasley, and ends as the violence.”

If the food aid is not delivered, the number of children in danger of dying of acute malnutrition will rocket to about 400,000, an increase of 22% over 2020. “We are very concerned about the situation in Yemen,” said Beasley. “There is a solution to the famine, and that’s food and an end to the violence.”

A new form of understanding the virus has come from the discovery of a new strain of SARS-CoV-2, which is thought to have emerged in late 2020 or early 2021.

The new variant, known as the Delta variant, has been responsible for most of the recent surge in COVID-19 cases around the world. It is highly contagious and appears to be more virulent than previous variants.

The Delta variant is spreading rapidly across the globe, causing concern among public health officials. It is important to stay informed about the latest developments in this rapidly evolving situation.

Coronavirus is likely here to stay, says EU health agency chief

The coronavirus will probably continue to circulate long-term, even after the European region is declared free of the disease, the European Centre for Disease Prevention and Control (ECDC), said on Friday, saying Europe is likely to keep its restrictive measures in place for some time.

"It seems more likely that it will be a disease of the future... of long-term transmission, but how long is anybody's guess," said Adriaan Altena, the head of the ECDC and the lead author of the report.

The report said that the virus is likely to persist for months or years, with periodic spikes in infections. The report also said that the use of face masks and social distancing could help reduce transmission rates.

It added that the vaccination campaigns have been successful in reducing the spread of the virus, but that further measures may be needed to control outbreaks.

The ECDC also recommended that people continue to wear face masks in crowded indoor settings, such as public transport, and that social distancing measures be maintained in areas with high transmission rates.

SAGE report welcomed by rights activists who say it opens the way to broader prisoner reforms

By Harrow Jepson

A landmark report, published this week by the Scientific Advisory Group for Emergencies (SAGE), has been welcomed by rights activists as a step towards broader prisoner reforms.

In a letter directed at Prime Minister Boris Johnson, SAGE recommended that prison sentences should be reduced by one-third, in order to prevent overcrowding.

The recommendation is based on evidence showing that prisoners are at higher risk of contracting COVID-19, and that reducing their sentences could help to prevent the spread of the virus in prisons.

The report also recommended that prisoners who are at high risk of severe illness should be prioritised for release, and that regular testing and contact tracing should be implemented in prisons.

Some activists have welcomed the recommendations as a step towards ending the "prison industrial complex" and promoting social justice.

Demand for online shopping and home delivery services has again surged due to the imposition of coronavirus (Covid-19) restrictions in the country, it is learnt.

Speaking to Gulf Times, LuLu Group International regional manager for Qatar, Saudi Arabia and Egypt, Leila Sanii stated that the hypermarket confirmed a considerable increase in demand over the past two weeks.

She said that Lulu has doubled its capacity for home deliveries at various locations in the country to serve customers who choose to shop online amid the current situation.

“We have doubled the number of our delivery trucks. There is huge demand, particularly on food items, as well as groceries and baking products, probably because people who stay at home tend to cook and bake more,” Ms Sanii added.

Besides food items, she said that electronics and mobile devices such as smartphones, laptops, and tablets continue to be attractive for many customers, and many find home delivery to be practical for several reasons.

Mr Sanii said that Lulu’s “Click from Home” and “Door-2-Door delivery” services have also been affecting many shoppers since their inception.

In a note that shopping at Lulu stores across Qatar remains safe as Covid-19 precautionary measures are strictly adhered to, the safety of shoppers and staff is confirmed.
