Belgian prison in Covid-19 lockdown

A Belgian prison has been placed under quarantine and remains on alert after two of its inmates tested positive for the coronavirus (COVID-19) as authorities said.

In addition to the more than 125 inmates who tested positive, around 400 inmates in five other prisons in southeastern Belgium have also been infected since a first case was documented early last week.

One inmate was hospitalized and the situation is considered "very serious" and "severe and immediate action is needed," the health ministry said.

Belgian prisons are being distributed to inmates and they receive one meal per day, but snacks and water are not permitted and they can no longer access the shower rooms.

The more contiguous British territory of the Falkland Islands remains under British authority, where authorities called for "very great caution" as signs of a rebound in the pandemic emerged.
