Religious groups on US blacklist over IS links

The United States has put nearly 100 Islamic organizations on its blacklist over IS links, according to US officials, prompting concern from governments and human rights groups over the wide-ranging action.

The step, announced on Thursday, marks a significant escalation in the US approach to dealing with IS and its affiliates, which have been a persistent threat in recent years.

The measure follows a US government crackdown on IS and its affiliates in recent years, including the designation of several individuals and organizations as terrorists, the imposition of travel bans and sanctions, and a variety of other measures.

However, the move has drawn criticism from some quarters, who argue that it is too broad and could inadvertently harm innocent civilians and make it more difficult to combat the threat.

The US Treasury Department said in a statement that the designations were made under a law that allows the US to designate foreign terrorist organizations.

The measure will also affect individuals and entities associated with the blacklisted groups, including those who provide material support or financial assistance.

The designations are expected to have a significant impact on the groups' ability to operate and raise funds, and could also lead to legal action against their members.

Human rights groups have voiced concerns that the move could harm innocent civilians and make it more difficult to combat the threat.

A real estate transaction should be made in accordance with the existing laws and regulations governing property sales. If a person fails to follow these regulations, they could be found guilty of violating the law and face legal consequences.

The sale of property must be made through an official and registered sale contract. This contract should be signed by both parties, and it should include a description of the property, its location, and the price agreed upon. The contract should be witnessed by a notary public or a registered legal expert.

After the sale is completed, the property should be transferred to the new owner's name. This can be done through a change of ownership deed, which is a legal document that transfers the property from the seller to the buyer. The deed should be registered with the local government to ensure that the transfer of ownership is legally binding.

If the sale is not completed properly or if the property is not properly transferred, the buyer may face legal consequences. For example, if the seller still owns the property after the sale is completed, they could be held liable for any damages or losses incurred by the buyer.
