SOUTH KOREA: minister at centre of police strategy to offer resigns

South Korea's minister of public safety and national security has become the centre of a police strategy to offer resigns. The minister, who is also the leader of the ruling Democratic Party, has faced criticism over his handling of the recent protests against police brutality.

The Seoul police said they had summoned the minister to appear before them on Wednesday. The minister, who has been a key figure in the protests, has faced calls to quit over his handling of the protests.

The minister's move came after a series of protests and rallies in Seoul, the capital, and other major cities in recent days.

The minister has faced criticism over his handling of the protests, which have been the largest in South Korea in decades.

The minister's resignation could be seen as a sign of the government's growing pressure to address the ongoing protests.

Americans support restricting those not vaccinated from offices, travel: poll

President Joe Biden has finally told US states to make all federal contractors and vendors require workers to get vaccinated against COVID-19. The president’s move comes as the US faces a surge in cases and hospitalizations driven by the highly transmissible delta variant of the virus.

Under the new policy, federal contractors and vendors are required to ensure that all employees are vaccinated or have negative COVID-19 test results. The policy also applies to people who work at sites where federal contracts are performed.

The policy is expected to cover an estimated 25 million workers in the federal contractor sector.

As of July 4, 2021, Biden was facing criticism from Republicans who argued that the policy was an overreach and would lead to job losses. However, the White House defended the policy, saying it was necessary to protect the health and well-being of federal workers and the American public.

President Biden and Vice President Kamala Harris discussed the policy during a virtual town hall event with workers in the hospitality industry. The two leaders emphasized the importance of vaccines in protecting against COVID-19 and called on all Americans to get vaccinated.

The Biden administration has been working to increase vaccination rates, particularly among vulnerable communities. The goal is to achieve herd immunity by the fall, when children under the age of 12 may be eligible for vaccination.

The US Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) has recommended that all people aged 12 and older get vaccinated against COVID-19.

Despite the challenges, the Biden administration has made significant progress in expanding vaccination access. The US has administered over 370 million doses of COVID-19 vaccines so far, with more than 120 million people fully vaccinated.

As the country works to contain the pandemic, the Biden administration will continue to focus on vaccination and other public health measures to protect Americans.
The Prime Minister's Office released a statement on the first anniversary of the UK joining the Commonwealth. It said, "It is a day to reflect on the progress we have made since 2016, and to look forward to the opportunities ahead." The statement also noted that the UK has been a strong supporter of the Commonwealth's values, and that it will continue to work closely with its members to promote prosperity and stability.

The statement went on to say, "We are committed to playing our part in making the Commonwealth a vibrant and relevant international organization that can help shape the world of tomorrow. We will continue to work with our partners to ensure that the Commonwealth remains a vital force for good in the world."

The struggle for technology sovereignty in Europe

By Human Never

The world’s largest pharmaceutical companies are under pressure to share their technology with the world, especially as the coronavirus pandemic continues to spread. The European Union (EU) has been at the forefront of this effort, calling for a global solution to the pandemic. However, the EU’s efforts have been met with resistance from some countries, leading to a rift between the Union and its Member States.

In a previous article, I discussed the challenges of technology sovereignty in Europe and the need for a global solution. Since then, the situation has only worsened. The lack of coordination and cooperation between Member States has made it difficult to achieve a common approach.

The EU has proposed creating an “open-source pool” of knowledge and resources to address the pandemic. This would allow other countries to access the same technology and knowledge that the EU possesses, thereby reducing the risk of a global pandemic and increasing technology sovereignty.

However, not all Member States are on board with this proposal. Some countries, such as France and Italy, have expressed concerns about sharing their technology with other countries, fearing that it would undermine their own sovereignty.

The EU’s proposal has also been met with resistance from the pharmaceutical industry, which sees it as a threat to their revenue streams.

In conclusion, the struggle for technology sovereignty in Europe continues to be a major issue, as the world faces the ongoing pandemic. The EU’s efforts to create an open-source pool of knowledge and resources are a step in the right direction, but more needs to be done to ensure that technology sovereignty is achieved.

Antitrust is subject to is subject to a number of factors, including politics, economics, and public opinion. The EU’s recent move to fine Google for anticompetitive behavior is a prime example of this. The fine was seen as a way to protect European businesses and consumers from the dominance of Google’s search engine.

Antitrust laws, such as the Sherman Act in the US and the Competition Act in the EU, are designed to prevent monopolies and ensure fair competition. However, these laws are often subject to political pressure and public opinion, which can influence their enforcement.

In the case of Google, the fine was seen as a way to protect European businesses and consumers from the dominance of Google’s search engine. The EU’s move was seen as a way to prevent Google from using its market power to harm competitors and consumers.

However, it is important to note that antitrust laws are not perfect. They can be used to harm competitors and harm consumers, as we saw with the EU’s recent move to fine Google.

The EU’s move to fine Google is a step in the right direction, but it is important to ensure that antitrust laws are used to protect consumers and businesses, rather than to harm them.

Malala urges educating girls to fight climate change

Malala Yousafzai

K eeping girls in schools and women free from sexual violence are key to achieving the UN’s Sustainable Development Goals, UNICEF Executive Director Michelle Bachelet told the UN’s Human Rights Council in Geneva on Monday. "We must also listen to the voices of young people on every continent. They are leading the movement for change. They are speaking up for the planet. They are speaking up for justice. They are speaking up for human rights," Bachelet said.

Youth leaders are sounding the warning bells that climate change is the biggest threat to their present and future. "There is no Planet B. We have one and we have to protect it," Malala Yousafzai told the UN Human Rights Council on Monday. Malala, the 22-year-old Pakistani activist and Nobel Laureate, said that climate change is a "global emergency." She called on countries to act now to prevent further damage to the environment.

"We are on the threshold of a climate emergency," Malala said, "and we are not prepared.

"We need to act now. We need to listen to the young people who are telling us the truth," she added.

Malala urged the world to take action on climate change and to invest in renewable energy sources. "We need to invest in renewable energy and phase out fossil fuels," she said. "We need to protect the oceans and the forests and the land," she added.

"We need to act now before it is too late," Malala said, "because if we don’t act now, the consequences will be catastrophic for future generations."

"We are already feeling the effects of climate change," she said. "Fires, floods, droughts, heat waves, and storms are all increasing in frequency and intensity.

"We are already seeing the impact of climate change on our health and our economy," she added. "We need to act now to prevent further damage to the environment."

Malala also urged countries to take action on sexual violence and discrimination. "We need to end violence against women and girls," she said. "We need to have equal rights for men and women in every country.

Box Park offers space to unwind

Qatar sends medical aid to Equatorial Guinea

With its vibrant shopping centre, restaurants and entertainment venues, Box Park has become a popular place for visitors to enjoy their time in Qatar.

"Box Park offers a unique experience for visitors, offering a mix of dining, shopping and entertainment options," said H.E. Ms. Hessa Saeed Al Humaid, Director of Box Park.

Box Park is located in Doha's West Bay area, near the corniche, and is easily accessible by public transport or car. Visitors can enjoy a variety of local and international cuisine, browse through fashion boutiques, or relax in the open-air cafes and gardens.

Qatar recently sent medical aid to Equatorial Guinea, including medical equipment, supplies, and personnel, to support the country in its efforts to combat the COVID-19 pandemic.

"Qatar is committed to supporting countries in need, especially those that are facing significant health challenges," said H.E. Ms. Sarah Al Amiri, Qatar’s Minister of State for International Cooperation.

Box Park is a testament to Qatar's commitment to providing a safe and welcoming environment for all visitors, regardless of gender or background. The venue is open to everyone, and visitors are encouraged to explore the wide range of offerings available.

Qatar's efforts to include women in peace efforts, as well as its support for other countries, demonstrate the country's commitment to promoting gender equality and international cooperation.
