Qatar committed to ensuring quality education for marginalised children: minister

The programme aims to increase the capacity and accountability of communities to enhance the enrolment and retention of out-of-school children (OOSC). Moreover, the project seeks to ensure the provision of quality teaching and learning in all parts of the country, including remote and underdeveloped areas, and to address the alternative provision of education, building teachers’ capacities, renovating classrooms, constructing WASH (water, sanitation and hygiene) facilities, and improving access to learning for children with disabilities to guarantee that no child is left behind.

To date, EAC programme, alongside its partners, has recorded over 70,120 commitments to enroll OOSC into schools, reaching 9,200 children with more than 140,000 such children already enrolled, EAC said in a statement.

In order to complement national education strategies and priorities, EAA works to address disparities and improve quality of education, reaching the education rights of the hardest children (OOSC). Through this, EAC continues to deliver banners to education, such as poverty, social status, gender discrimination, and special needs, with and vulnerability and marginalisation.

The programme will aim to increase the capacity and accountability of communities to enhance the enrolment and retention of out-of-school children (OOSC). Moreover, the project seeks to ensure the provision of quality teaching and learning in all parts of the country, including remote and underdeveloped areas.

Vaccine nationalists aren’t immune and that is a fact

By Daron Acemoglu

A strong mass vaccination campaign picking up speed in the US, West, the end of the Covid-19 pandemic is starting to look like a real possibility for that, the United States and other rich countries have only themselves to blame. It has been clear at least since the early summer of 2020 that even with effective vaccines in hand, Covid-19 will not be stopped until populations everywhere have achieved herd immunity. But people are still susceptible to infection in small that the disease can no longer spread. It isn’t clear for any individual country to reach this point. As long as the irus is still circulating in other parts of the world, vaccines will continue to be needed. In addition, people will still be vulnerable to the virus, but some will not even have access to the vaccine.

Again, we already know this, just because December. How highly infectious strains of the Sars-CoV-2 virus have been identified. With a significantly higher transmission rate (and potentially a greater virulence), this could mean that the irus is spreading rapidly within the US and Europe. The fourth variant, R.3.1, may be even more contagious, and the Brazilian variant, J.1, is the most dangerous of all. The emergence of new variants presents the challenge of a global problem. Countries that made hard in (as some likely at the current vaccination rate), Brazil still will not be out of the woods. Unless the US scales itself (and) from the rest of the world (which is essentially impossible), those who travel outside the country will bring back new variants, and some of these could be capable of bypassing the protections afforded by the current vaccine.

As is so often the case, it emerged that much of the attention was focused on the emerging third wave of infections, implying that immunity against the new variant is still developing. Thus, nationalists should be able to reengineer the vaccine to be effective against the new variants. A third dose might be necessary, taking advantage of the mRNA technology used by the Moderna and BioNTech Covid-19 vaccines. But this flexibility is small consolation after a variant arises in a community and forces economic and social lockdowns back into a state of lockdowns. Once this happens, the entire population must queue up for booster shots. Herd immunity is still achievable, but now will involve two vaccine doses. With Johnson & Johnson’s new one-dose vaccine, the disadvantages are likely to increase now, and booster shots will be needed. The Global Alliance for Vaccines & Immunisation should take steps now to ensure that vaccines are delivered to the poorest countries, and rich countries should not cut off the poorest countries with富裕 doses instead of attempting to provide more vaccines to the poorest countries.

The world of vaccines, Covid-19, and the need for collective action should be an opportunity to move towards equitable and effective vaccine distribution. In the developing world, there is still a need for vaccines to be produced, and for vaccines to be delivered to the poorest countries.

The demand for vaccines in rich countries is already overwhelming, and the need for vaccines in the developing world is still urgent. A rising tide lifts all boats.
Britain is considering whether to make misogyny a hate crime and fold the offence into a new category of violence against women following national outrage over the murder of a woman who went missing as she walked home in London.

Campaigners say changing the law to class misogyny as a hate crime would help in the detection and prevention of offences, including street harassment, sexual assault and domestic abuse.

An amendment to the Domestic Abuse Bill is to be debated in a parliamentary chamber this week, which would require police on England and Wales to record in certain cases in which crimes were motivated in whole or part by hatred or severity towards women.

“This is a simple measure that we could take now to make women safer at home and on our streets, and I want to see it supported by the government,” said barrister, former Metropolitan Police officer Helen Mancini, who led the amendment, banned from representing the public for six years following allegations by a black woman she represented that he had racially abused and mishandled her case.

The number of Sarah Everard, who vanished in south London on March 3, has so far dominated national coverage, with demands for stricter policing, more robust investigations and assurances of justice from the Metropolitan Police Authority and the government.

A police officer, Wayne Couzens, has been charged with Everard’s kidnap and murder.

“Aggravated burglary, kidnap and murder,” said the force.

The murder of Sarah Everard, who vanished in south London on March 3, and the police response to the protest "have disgusted and appalled the Metropolitan Police," said the force.

British Prime Minister Boris Johnson yesterday backed the Metropolitan Police’s handling of protests after footage emerged of officers hacking a woman’s hair and pouncing on her as she walked down the street.

Johnson said he had full confidence in the Metropolitan Police Commissioners and that he supported the police’s measures which they had taken to handle the gathering on Saturday.

A government spokesman said that the case was not in the public interest.

AstraZeneca’s shot was among the first and cheapest to be rolled out among the EU member states, and had been approved by the European Medicines Agency on the condition that the government could pause and recommence vaccinations if necessary, following reports of potential side-effects.

The United Kingdom said it was suspending the administration of the AstraZeneca vaccine after reports of unusual bleeding and blood clots in some recipients, and that four people had died.

AstraZeneca’s vaccine was one of the first vaccines to be approved in the EU, and is manufactured in the UK.

The EU said it was reviewing the blood clot reports, and that it would continue to monitor the safety of the vaccine.

The court said that if it received any concerns about the vaccine that would result in further steps, including a possible suspension of the rollout.
