MoPH partners mark World Breastfeeding Week

The Ministry of Public Health (MoPH) in conjunction with HMC, the Primary Health Care Corporation (PHCC), and Al Mawsoura Education Arab University (AQUA) has launched a campaign to mark World Breastfeeding Week. The campaign was launched on Monday, August 1, 2021. The aim of the campaign is to draw attention to the importance of breastfeeding mothers, especially within the first few hours of giving birth to successfully breastfeed their babies, and emphasizing the importance of supporting women throughout breastfeeding, as well as to advocate breastfeeding by protecting, promoting, and social media to deliver messages that support breastfeeding and increasing awareness campaigns across Qatar.

The campaign is held in Arabic and English at the Ministry of Public Health Qatar, the Primary Health Care Corporation (PHCC) and community awareness projects held in co-operation with its partners in the health sector to promote breastfeeding and launch awareness campaigns for both the mother and child health forum held this month.

More awareness-raise ing exercises and health education for six-month-old babies will also be organized in the pediatric units at Qatar Children's Hospital and Al-po lice hospitals, where the link will be sent to students via e-mail with the details of the induction programme platform.

QU receives new students for Fall 2021

Qatar University (QU) has welcomed 3,650 new students for the Fall 2021 semester at its main campus in Doha, QM reported. The university is welcoming the largest number of students this year, having been accepted, of which over 73% are Qatari students. QU’s president and vice-chancellor stated that more than 90% of the students have accepted the offers of admission. This comes as the admissions process has been completed.

The administration of QU has stepped up in a smooth manner via the electronic platform, where the link will be sent to students via emails. According to the Department of Admissions at Qatar University, the intake programmes for students admitted to the College of Engineering, Health Sciences and Arts, and the School of Business will start on Aug 5, while the College of Management and Information Technology, College of Medicine and Dentistry and College of Pharmacy and Health Sciences will start on Aug 11. The administration announced that all accepted students can log in to the system and fill the details to receive the information for the programme platform.

The university said that the applicants could access QU’s “electronic induction programme” platform. QU is scheduled to hold the programme for all students admitted to the university, and said: “Through BFHI, we are keen to assist mothers in applying optimal practices of exclusive breastfeeding for a period of six months and continuing until the age of two years.”

One of the objectives of achieving this is by supporting breast- feeding by protecting, promoting, and social media to deliver messages that support breastfeeding and increasing awareness campaigns for both the mother and child health forum held this month.

Two teams of pre-medical students from Weill Cornell Medicine – Qatar (WCM-Q) have been highly commended after creating solutions to two problems highlighted by the Ministry of Public Health (MoPH) in Qatar.

Under the mentorship of Dr Maha al-Sheh, lecturer in chemistry at the Division of Pharmaceutical Education at the WCM-Q, the students entered the National Artificial Intelligence (AI) Competition sponsored by Sheikh Hamad bin Khalifa University (HBKU) and organized by Qatar University.

Each team entered in one of two categories; track 1 – concept and design, and track 2 – prototype and demonstration.

For track 1, the three participating students from the team – Maryam Arabi, Lisa Ahmed, and Dubai al-Majid – examined how artificial intelligence (AI) could be used to improve healthcare in the pandemic.

They realized that due to social distancing, patients are suffering from fear of infection, people are avoiding medical appointments, potentially putting themselves at risk of not receiving necessary procedures, and the healthcare system is struggling to keep up with the strain.

The students came up with the idea of using drone technology that would allow doctors to examine patients remotely.

The drone would be able to take vital signs and perform necessary procedures, and an algorithm – written by the students – would be used to identify and analyze further medical intervention was needed.

A student from track 2 – Khalifa University (HBKU) and Cornell Medicine – Qatar – examined how AI could be used for the software for the future in setting up experimental parameters for a chemical kinetic experiment, which is the study of reaction rates and how they are impacted by factors such as pressure, temperature, and concentration.

Dr Sebah, who worked closely with both teams offering support and guidance, said: “We are incredibly grateful to have had this early exposure in my future research papers,” she said. “I believe that this competition equipped us with the necessary tools and knowledge that will allow us to get involved in research and understand the concept of translating laboratory findings into practical solutions.”

Chinese cities test millions as Covid-19 cases climb

Several Chinese cities have imposed severe restrictions this week as the Delta variant continues to spread, prompting authorities to launch mass testing and lockdowns. Beijing, the country's capital, and Shanghai, its financial hub, have both reported new infections, with the virus spreading across the country.

In Beijing, authorities have ordered a citywide lockdown for seven days after a case was detected in the city's suburbs. The local government has also restricted people from leaving the city for non-work reasons and has closed schools.

Shanghai, meanwhile, has announced stricter control measures, including the suspension of in-person classes in primary and secondary schools, and the imposition of a 14-day quarantine period for people who have been in contact with confirmed cases.

The new cases are a stark reminder of the ongoing threat posed by the Delta variant, which has become the dominant strain in many parts of the world, including China. The country has reported more than 11,000 cases since the beginning of the pandemic, with the majority occurring in recent months.

Despite the strict measures, experts warn that it is too early to declare victory over the virus. "We must remain vigilant," said a Chinese virologist. "This is a critical period for containing the spread of the Delta variant."

The new cases come as other parts of the world also struggle to contain the virus. In the United States, daily infections have been on the rise, with more than 100,000 cases reported in the past week. In Europe, a new wave of infections has emerged, with countries like the United Kingdom and Spain reporting record numbers.

The global pandemic has yet to be fully contained, with millions of lives lost and economies still struggling to recover.

New polls in two years: Myanmar junta chief

Myanmar's military junta said it would hold elections in two years, a move that could potentially shift the country's political landscape. The announcement comes amid growing international pressure on the junta, which has been accused of widespread human rights abuses.

The military, which has been in power since 1962, said it would hold elections in 2024, a decision that could pave the way for a civilian government. However, many observers remain skeptical, with concerns over the junta's commitment to democracy and its willingness to relinquish power.

The announcement was made by Myanmar's junta chief, Senior Gen. Min Aung Hlaing, who has been in power since the 2016 coup. He said the elections would be held in accordance with the constitution and would be free and fair.

The move comes as the country faces a growing crisis, with tens of thousands of people displaced by military operations and economic sanctions imposed by the United Nations and the United States.

Human rights groups have called for a boycott of the elections, with many politicians and activists refusing to participate. "The elections are a sham, we will not participate," said a leading political figure. "We will continue our struggle for democracy and human rights."
The United States will now lock down again to "circuit break" the coronavirus as "hot spots" where the delta variant fuels a rapid surge of infections continue to spread. While the delta variant is largely responsible for the increase in cases of COVID-19, it can also infect people who are vaccinated, although it is less likely to cause severe illness or hospitalization.

"Not enough to crush the outbreak, but I believe it will go down," said Dr. Anthony Fauci. "The delta variant is probably not the last iteration of this virus." He went on to say that the US should be "cautiously optimistic" because the number of cases is "going down slowly." Yet, he also emphasized that the pandemic is "far, far from over."

Fauci noted that the US has vaccinated about 90% of adults and the overall rate of vaccination is high. However, he stressed that it is important to continue to vaccinate more people, especially those who are older or have underlying health conditions.

"The US started to lockdown in March and April 2020," Fauci said. "We have done better at vaccinating people than the rest of the world. But we still have a long way to go." He added that the US needs to increase vaccination efforts, especially in areas with lower vaccination rates.

Fauci also noted that the US is still struggling with the delta variant, which has spread rapidly in recent weeks. The variant has also triggered a surge in hospitalizations and deaths, particularly among those who are unvaccinated.

"We are not through the pandemic yet," Fauci said. "We still have a long way to go." He added that the US needs to continue to work together to vaccinate more people and to protect those who are vulnerable to the virus.

The Delta variant: Infection intensity alarms scientists

A recent outbreak in Provincetown, Massachusetts, has exposed the high transmissibility of the Delta variant, prompting alarms from scientists who fear its impact on vaccination efforts.

"It was on May 13 that people in the US were told they no longer needed to wear masks indoors or outdoors if they had been vaccinated. The new guidance reflects a                                                                 tement. As Kathleen Neuzil, a vaccine expert at the University of Maryland School of Medicine, said, getting more people vaccinated remains the priority, but the public may also have become complacent about whether coronavirus vaccines remain effective and "a public convinced no more work would be needed.""

"Infection intensity as easily as chickenpox. Even more alarming is the finding that people who were vaccinated were transmitting the virus as easily as those who were unvaccinated. Vaccinated people infected with Delta have the same viral load as those who are unvaccinated and infected with the variant. CDC scientists were so alarmed by the new research that the agency last week significantly changed guidelines for vaccinated people even before making new data public.

The data and studies cited in the document played a key role in revising the official guidelines that call for everyone in the US — vaccinated or not — to wear masks indoors in public settings or in certain circumstances. There is a higher risk among older age groups for hospitalization and death relative to younger people, regardless of vaccination status. The document outlines "communication challenges" faced by cases in vaccinated people, including concerns from local health officials about whether coronavirus vaccines remain effective and "a public convinced no more work would be needed.""
