Semenya to run 800m in California

The the Court of Arbitration for Sport (CAS) last month revoked South Africa's Olympic 800m champion Caster Semenya's ban after she lost her appeal against the IAAF’s new regulations that limit testosterone levels in female athletes. The Court ruled that the regulations were discriminatory and had failed to provide adequate medical evidence to back up their decision.

Semenya, who is a South African track and field sprinter, had been ruled ineligible to compete in the 800m and 1,500m at the Tokyo Olympics last year due to her naturally high testosterone levels. The IAAF, which is now known as World Athletics, had previously imposed a suspension on Semenya after she failed to bring her testosterone levels below 2.0 nmol/l.

However, the Court of Arbitration for Sport ruled that the regulations were discriminatory and that the IAAF had not provided adequate medical evidence to support its position. The Court also ruled that the regulations were not necessary to protect female athletes and that they discriminated against female athletes with naturally high testosterone levels.

Semenya’s lawyer, Perry Cross, said in a statement: “We are pleased with the decision of the Court of Arbitration for Sport. The Court has clearly stated that the IAAF’s anti-doping regulations are discriminatory and that they fail to protect female athletes.”

Semenya, who had previously won gold medals in the 800m and 1,500m at the IAAF World Championships, said in a statement: “I am grateful for the support that I have received from my loved ones, coaches, and fans. I look forward to competing in future events.”
