Ljubljana, Slovenia: The doctor who is to be the new head coach of the Australian Open tennis tournament has been granted a visa.

"We're very excited to welcome him to our team," he said.

"The decision to cancel Djakovic's visa was made in the interests of national security and the public interest," he said.

"This is a difficult decision, but we believe it is necessary to protect the Australian public from a potential security risk, and to safeguard the integrity of our tennis system," he added.

Djakovic, who has represented Australia in five Grand Slam events, is currently ranked 15th in the world and was expected to be a strong title contender at the Australian Open.

"I understand the decision, but I'm heartbroken," he said.

"I've been training hard and looking forward to competing at the Australian Open, one of the most prestigious tournaments in the world. I've been working with my team and preparing for this event for months."

"I'm disappointed that I won't be able to compete, but I respect and understand the decision. I'll take this opportunity to rest and regroup, and come back stronger in the future."

The decision to cancel Djakovic's visa was made in the interests of national security and the public interest, it said.

"The Australian government's decision to cancel Djakovic's visa was based on a thorough assessment of the information presented to them. We have been ever vigilant in ensuring the safety and security of our tennis events, and we take any threat to our tournaments very seriously," it added.

"We understand and appreciate the difficulties Djakovic is facing, but we believe it is necessary to make this decision in the interest of our players, staff, fans and the wider community."

"I'm looking forward to returning to Australia as soon as possible. I hope to compete at the Australian Open in the future, and I will continue to train hard and prepare for the next event."

The Australian government has been under pressure to scrap Djakovic's visa, which was granted on appeal by a Federal Court judge in December.

The court had ruled that the original visa cancellation decision was based on "incorrect and insufficient" evidence.

"We are disappointed with the decision of the court, but we will comply with its ruling," the government said.

"We take our responsibility to the Australian public seriously, and we are committed to ensuring the safety and security of our events. We will continue to assess all security risks and make decisions accordingly."

"We appreciate the support of the community and our fans, and we are committed to delivering a world-class tennis tournament next year."

The Australian Open is set to return in 2023, with the tournament scheduled to take place from January 15-28.

"We are excited to welcome back the best players in the world," the government said.

"We will continue to work with all stakeholders to ensure the safety and security of the tournament, and we will make any necessary adjustments to the event plan."

"We are confident that we will deliver a world-class tournament, and we look forward to welcoming players and fans from around the world."
